While he generally assumes a professorial stance before his class, Satterthwaite's relationships with his students are hardly of the typical educator-learner variety. More like a story told among friends than a formal Williams lecture, Satterthwaite's classroom discussions and other dealings with his students substantiate the sincerity of his claim that his pupils are his intellectual peers. "You have all kinds of knowledge that I'd like to have," said Satterthwaite, adding that he is perhaps "more of a student than the students he teaches."

Indeed this may be true. Satterthwaite prefers papers that are filled with more questions than answers since he appreciates ambiguity rather than demanding an answer for every question. "I'm more comfortable in the interrogative mode," he explained.

Satterthwaite once described his teaching style by saying, "I'm really just a kind of tour guide, hotel desk clerk, sort of like an academic pimp, arranging encounters." He said that he views his courses as a "joint exploration" and papers as "vaguely an example of joint thinking." Reading through Satterthwaite's comments on papers, students are surprised by not only their volume and detail, but also their encouraging nature which prompts further exploration.

Noticeably absent from Satterthwaite's relations with his subject or students are value judgements. He said he finds it difficult to say one landscape is better than another simply because he feels it is "helpful not excluding oneself from what is out there." In the same way, Satterthwaite refrains from labeling students. He has noticed a preponderence of male athletes in his classes, many of whom arrive there, according to Satterthwaite, because of what he calls the "fourth course syndrome." "I needed a gut," said one Sheafe-alum.

Gut-monger

"Am I a gut-monger?" wonders Satterthwaite. He said he thinks not, preferring the notion that his courses entail less textual research and more reflection on personal interaction with the landscape. Satterthwaite's students have a "tendency to take courses for which they can write papers on stuff with which they're quite familiar," he reasoned, adding that "it's all right in one's head."

By assisting students better express what they already know, Satterthwaite said he feels that he helps students whom he calls "clunkers" — a combination of flunker and clinker. He explained further that a "clinker" is a piece of coal which, despite its position in a furnace, never ignites. Satterthwaite said he has an "uncanny ability to pick up what people are very good at." He sees much intellectual potential on the playing fields and in athletic practices that is untapped at Williams.

Although he would like to publish one day, for now Satterthwaite is content to continue adding his comments to his students' work. He keeps all of these papers in his own special library and hopes such collaborations can be used to help teach future students how to tap their own powers of observation. He also hopes to someday teach a semester course "in the field" for a more hands-on and objective experience. "There is a lot of learning yet to be done," said Satterthwaite. A curious character, this Sheafe Satterthwaite.

ials instead of the electives that they now teach. Mathematics professor Deborah Bergstrand said she was willing to give up electives "if the mathematicians we graduate can think better."

History professor Thomas Kohut expressed concern over the fact that tutorials do not emphasize content as heavily as elective courses do.

College President Francis Oakley replied, "Over centuries people have gotten educations in the tutorial format. You do cover content. More of the burden is thrown back on the student."

Several committee members said they were concerned about how much preparation tutorials would demand of the faculty. Jorling noted that "expanding the faculty without increasing the size of the student body should have some beneficial effects on the faculty workload," Jorling.

Men's squash beats Trinity

by Chuck Samuelson

The men's varsity squash team extended its winning streak to four games with awesome play against Trinity, the University of Rochester and State University of New York at Stony Brook. Only two players lost matches as the Ephs improved their record to 13-4.

In the team's 9-0 win over Stony Brook on Sunday, the Ephs lost only seven games on the day. The number one and two players, co-captain Keith Goldfeld '87 and Wendell Chestnut '88, were the only players to be tested, both winning 3-2. Co-captain Matt McCall '87, Seth Packard '89, and Chris Klipstein '89 all won 3-1, and Zia Mahmood '90, Pier Friend '88, Dana Weeder '88 and Lewis Fischer '89 each won 3-0.

On Friday, Williams outconditioned Rochester in a decisive 9-0 win in front of a home crowd. Coming off of an emotional win over Trinity, the performance against Rochester was "a sign of a pretty mature team," according to Coach Sean Sloane. Doug Gilbert '89, McCall, Chestnut, Friend and Fischer coasted to 3-0 victories. Rick Hedeman '88 and Packard, playing in only his second varsity match, cruised to 3-1 wins.

Goldfeld faced a tougher match against Andy Corneli, but won 3-2. Weeder was tested against Rochester's number four player, Jeff Parker. Weeder took the first two games handily, but Parker took the next two. In the deciding fifth game, Weeder sensed victory and turned it on, winning nine of the rubber game's first ten points en route to a 15-7 clincher.

On Wednesday, in the team's biggest win of the season, Williams crushed Trinity by a 7-2 score for their first victory over the Bantams in four years. "We've got a lot of confidence in the team," said McCall after the victory. Fischer said that "we were a lot more composed (than Trinity)."

The team's only two losses were suffered by Chestnut and Packard by 2-3 scores. Chestnut played a very close match against Bruce Hauptfuhrer, often diving for seemingly unreachable shots. There were five lead changes in the fifth game alone, with the Bantam emerging victorious.

With the exception of these two losses, everything came up roses for the Ephs, as four players rolled to 3-0 wins. Goldfeld played brilliantly, topping the previously unbeaten Chris Smith by a 3-1 margin, and McCall beat Eric Scheyer 3-1. In McCall's match, the two split the opening games and the third game proved to be decisive. McCall took control in the tiebreaker and won 18-14. His momentum carried over into the final game which he won handily, 15-8.

Friend's 3-2 win over David Confair brought praise from Sloane: "Pier Friend has won so many squeakers it's just amazing." Sloane said that the team's win could leave the squad ranked as high as sixth at the end of the season.

The Ephs will next play at the USSRA tourney on February 13 and 14 in Philadelphia.

SPORTS SHORTS

W. Hockey

Coach Jim Briggs had nothing but praise for the women's hockey team following its 6-2 loss to the Huskies of the University of Connecticut. He only lamented his team's inability to get off the good hard shot when they needed it, like their UConn counterparts were able to do.

The game started out well for the Ephs as they scored twice in the first five minutes of the first period. The first goal came as senior Kirsten Rooks scored on an assist from linemate Katherine Eaton '88 and was followed less than a minute later by senior co-captain Leslie Fernandes' goal, assisted by Michelle Barry '87. The Huskies tied the game in the second half of the period and the game went downhill from there.

The Ephwomen continued to pressure on offense, keeping the puck in the UConn zone most of the game, but gave up good scoring opportunities to the talented Husky squad on 3-on-2 and 2-on-1 breakaways. The opposition, which tallied two goals in each of the last two periods, was led by Lisa Fuchs who totalled a goal and five assists on the day.

Over the past two weeks, the squad has gone 1-2, beating RPI 5-4 and losing 3-2 to Wesleyan, whom they outshot 36-7. The team, 6-5, next plays tomorrow against RPI at home and away at Wesleyan Saturday.

W. Squash

The women's squash team enjoyed a solid midwinter break, shutting out Vassar and placing fourth in the Can-Am tournament to raise their record to 7-4.

The squad did not lose a single game in its trouncing of Vassar. "The entire team played superbly today," praised Coach Renzie Lamb. "Every player, from one through nine, put in a tremendous effort and it showed up in the scores."

The team was not as dominant at the tourney, where they defeated Queens College 5-0 to open play before falling to Dartmouth and the University of Toronto by identical 5-0 scores. The matches were closer than the scores indicated, however, as Senior Captain Amy Barstad went to five games in both losses and junior Jeanne Cioppse and sophomore Allison Buckner both pushed their opponents to four games. The Ephwomen closed out the tourney by again defeating Vassar to end up fourth in the seven team field.

Williams faced its toughest test this season in last Saturday's Howe Cup. Tonight the team travels to Trinity before this weekend's Little Three action at Wesleyan.

Skiing

The ski team traveled to Burlington last weekend for the University of Vermont carnival and returned with better than expected results. The women took fourth while the men placed sixth as the homestanders captured both halves of the carnival.

The women captured seventh in the slalom led by, Mari Omland '89 (9th), Monika Kopp '89 (28th), and Donna MacDonald '87 (33th). The latter two fell on their first runs and had to rebound to place highly. In the giant slalom, Omland took tenth with MacDonald eleventh and Amy Duncombe '89 20th as the Ephwomen were third.

On the Nordic side, Junior Kathy Wolfe had an outstanding day, placing sixth in the individual race and posting the second fastest relay leg in the carnival. Kristin Seeman '89 and Kirsten Froburg '90 also placed and skied legs in the relay.

The men's downhill team was led by freshman Lindon Seed who was fifth in the giant slalom and seventh in the slalom. J.P. Parisien '90 and Pat Gilmartin '90 came in behind Seed in the Grand Slalom, and senior Helge Weiner and Jed Scala '89 placed in the slalom. The team was second in the GS and fifth in the slalom.

The cross-country squad placed sixth with Bob Fisher '89 taking 24th, Grae Davis '89 28th, and Tod Niedeck '89 33rd. The relay team came in seventh after standing in fourth going into the last leg.

Earlier, the skiers had gone to the St. Lawrence carnival but failed to crack the top three. The team goes to Dartmouth this weekend before hosting our Winter Carnival February 20-21.

Wrestling

Led by 190 pounders Mark Duff '89 and Dan MacDonnell '87, the wrestling team finished a very respectable eighth out of twelve teams in the Northern New England Wrestling tournament. MacDonnell finished second in the 190 pound weight class, Duff was third at 190, and Steve Felix '90 came in fourth after losing his first match.

MacDonnell, in his first match of the year, won two decisions (3-2 and 9-6) despite having a chest injury that caused him to forfeit his championship match. The division was won by a University of New Hampshire wrestler who had already beaten Duff in an earlier round.

Duff has wrestled brilliantly at 190 throughout the season and Saturday was no exception. He won two matches by pin before losing by decision to the eventual winner. One of the sophomore's victories contained a memorable moment as the entire Williams team had to crawl around the mat looking for Duff's lost contact lens.

Freshman Felix continued his excellent work by finishing fourth in the tournament in losing in the semifinals of the consolation bracket. The only other Eph victory came from Drew Steckler '87, who posted a 4-3 win but was eliminated by the eventual 134 pound winner. According to Steckler, "considering it was our first time in the tournament and we were going up against Division I teams like UNH and excellent Division II teams like Springfield, our showing isn't a bad one. The competition was high quality, and it should better prepare us for the New Englands at the end of the year."

Earlier in the week, the Ephmen beat Trinity 37-12, lost to WPI 47-2 and to Plymouth 42-4. Duff was the only person to score points in these defeats.

The team goes to Bowdoin Saturday. — Scott Mozarsky jump and triple jump with leaps of 14' 10" and 32' 7 1/4". Macauley shone in the running events, winning the 55 meter hurdles and blazing to victory in the 400 meters. Her 400 time of 60.31 seconds was a new Eph record. She also anchored the mile relay team, coming from twenty yards back to win by 11 seconds.

Senior captain Becky Conklin ran strong to win the 1500 meters in 4:59, with Sara St. Antoine '89 third and Sarah Hams '89 fourth. Conklin was also part of a dominant display by the Eph's 800 meter runners. The three Eph entrants, Conklin, Susan Gray '90, and Jen Morris '89, fell behind Amherst's Tina Walker at the half-way point of the race. Suddenly, Gray, Conklin, and then Morris surged past Walker to capture the first three places in the race. Gray's winning time of 2:26.7 was only 9/10ths of a second off the school record.

Williams will host a meet this Saturday featuring the top runners in the Little Three against a team from Bates, Bowdoin, and Colby. The BBC team should pose a challenge, and some excellent times are expected.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

This week's recipient is sophomore off guard Missy Crouchley, who has led the 12-5 Ephwomen to victories in four of their last five basketball games. This weekend she was named M.V.P. of the Skidmore tournament as the squad captured the championship trophy. Missy, this Bud's for you!

Erratic hockey defeats Army, beaten by Jeffs

by Al Mottur

Having struggled to a poor 5-10-2 record, the men's hockey team has been unable to display any form of consistency over the past two weeks and has taken itself out of contention for the last ECAC playoff spot. The team's off-and-on play has been a problem all season and it was never more evident than over the past two weeks as the squad stunned Div. I Army 2-1 and then lost three days later to Div. III Amherst 5-4.

Last Saturday, the Ephs tied Wesleyan 2-2, another Div. III team, and earlier in the week the skaters travelled to Union where the Dutchmen handed them a 6-4 loss. The team's loss to Amherst and its tie against Wesleyan marked the second straight year that the squad did not win the Little Three and overshadowed the major upset of Army.

The only Division II team in the Little Three, Williams seems to have problems maintaining its intensity against opponents that most Eph skaters consider inferior. Prior to the one goal loss to the Lord Jeffs, one player said that the team would have "no excuse if it lost to Amherst." And after two periods the squad seemed well on its way toward victory, leading Amherst by a 4-2 score.

However, in the third period, the squad "simply stopped skating," according to Mike Swenson '89, and fell prey to a three goal Jeff rally which handed the Ephs their ninth loss of the year.

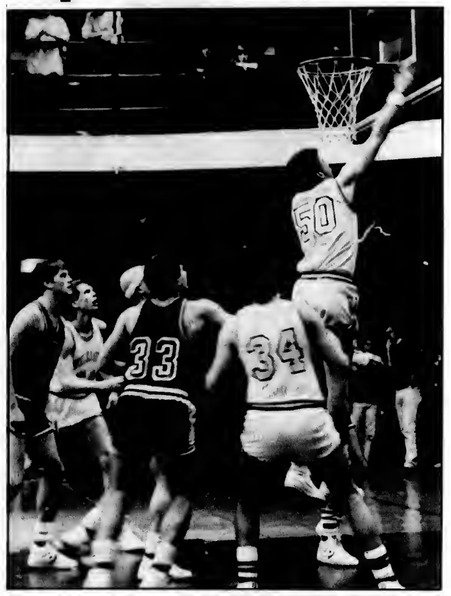
10-5 men's hoops chases playoff bid

by Stewart Verdery



The surge which produced a five game winning streak for the men's basketball team has ended, replaced by a four-game stretch of erratic play at a time when wins could qualify them for the ECAC playoffs. Nevertheless, the squad managed to split its games over the past two weeks, leaving its record at 10-5.

No game exemplified this trend better than Saturday's 78-72 win over Connecticut College. After jumping out to a 22 point first half lead, the Ephs collapsed in the second half, having their lead shaved to two with 1:03 remaining before sinking the Camels with six free throws.

The first half was perhaps the most dominating twenty minutes for the Ephs this season. Despite foul trouble, the team took leads of 6-0, 18-4 and 39-17 before settling for a 41-22 halftime margin.

The excitement of the first half outburst was cooled quickly after intermission, as the Camels outscored the Ephs 12-4 in the opening five minutes. At that point, senior Brandt Johnson took control, working relentlessly inside to tally five baskets over a seven minute span. The last of these gave Williams a comfortable 64-49 lead at the nine-minute mark.

Fouls continued to pile up on the Ephs, however, and when point guard Garcia Major '90 was forced to the bench with his fourth with eight minutes left, the Camels made their move. Closing to 69-61, they chose to foul captain Greg Lang '87. The redhead foiled the strategy by hitting 3-4 to extend the lead to 72-63. However, Camel star Scott Sawyer drained one three-pointer at 1:16 and then converted a four-point play as he sunk another bomb and was fouled by John Ciulla '87, pulling his team to within 72-70 at 1:03. Despite missing several front ends of one-and-ones, the Ephs clamped down defensively and won 78-72.

Dave Morrison '90 completes a power move to the basket against Union during winter action as Brandt Johnson '87 and John Ciulla '87 take notes. (Hazen)

Coach Harry Sheehy was upset with the second half performance, noting, "If we make our 1-and-1's, we win by 12. If we have better shot selection, we win by 15. If we play better all-around, we win by 20."

The Worcester Polytechnic Institute game was similiar to the Connetlcut College contest, as the Ephs jumped out to an

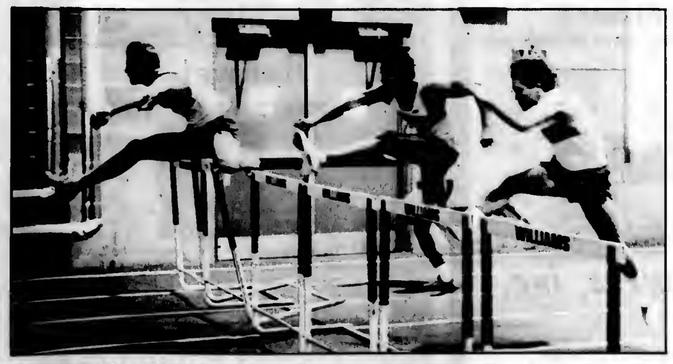
Track teams sweep Little Three foes

by Steve Brody

In a display of sheer domination, both the men's and women's track teams overwhelmed their Little Three competition at Towne Field House on Saturday. The final score of the men's meet was Williams 121, Amherst 63, Norwich 26, Wesleyan 18,and Middlebury 6. The women scored 82 points to Amherst's 36 and Wesleyan's 16.

The Ephmen started strong in the field events, as Joe McGinn '88 posted a victory in the 35 lb. weight throw to start the victory parade. Kenneth Alleyne '88 and Geoffrey Igharo '90 took first and second in the long jump; Ben Soriano '90 tied for victory in the high jump; and Igharo won the triple jump, an event in which the freshman is undefeated this season.



The first running event, the 1500 meters, began uneventfully, but the pace picked up as Eph seniors Jon Fisher and Mark Gilrain battled Amherst's Pete Sheldon for the lead. Sheldon was unable to keep up with the increased pace, however, and the Williams runners battled each other in the last quarter mile. It was Fisher who won, blazing through the last 300 meters in 46 seconds to edge Gilrain for the victory in 4:09.1.

Also exciting was the 500 meters, where Dave Nadelman '89 chased down his Amherst competitor on the final straightaway to capture the victory in a time of 1:08.2.

Other Ephmen in fine form were Andre Lopez '87, winning the 400 meters in 51.99 seconds; Igharo, who captured the 55 meter dash in 6.75; and Dave Grossman '87, who ran away from the field to win the 3000 meters in 8:56.

The stars of the meet for the women were sophomores Sue Northen and Dawn Macauley. Northen dominated the field events, winning both the long

Crouchley excels for cagers

by Drew Sawyer

Emerging with a 12-5 record and renewed playoff hopes, the women's basketball team returned home Saturday evening from the Skidmore Invitational with its first championship trophy of the season and three members on the all-tournament team. Power forward Nancy Hedeman '89 and point guard Kim Hatch '88 made the squad while sophomore off-guard Missy Crouchley was named Tournament M.V.P.

Colby-Sawyer was the first victim for the squad, falling 69-61. Stymied by the team's full court man-to-man defense, Colby-Sawyer was held at bay offensively, whereas the Ephwomen were fired up by the inspirational play of Joyce Rogers '88. Said Asst. Coach Jim Duquette, Rogers is "a real sparkplug out there!"

The squad was leading by twenty when Head Coach Nancy Roberts inserted the reserves who held off a last-gasp rally, sending the Ephs into a championship showdown. Game stars were Crouchley who poured in 24 with help from Hatch who dished out eight assists.

Against New England College in the final, Roberts devised a defensive scheme to counter their fast break and star player Missy Gaughan. A 1-2-2 full court zone press did the trick. The Pilgrims could not ignite their transition game but countered with a triangle and two which was clamped on leading Williams scorers Hedeman and Crouchley. The Ephs responded with outside scoring from Hatch and Julia Beasley '89 and inside points from Megan King '90.

In the second half Williams dominated. Said Duquette, "Everything we threw up in the second half either went in or ended up in our hands." Crouchley and Hedeman combined for over 50 points with help from Beasley and Hatch. The Ephwomen won by an impressive 22 point margin of 81-59.

On January 28 against Vassar, the women broke the century mark for the first time in Williams history, crushing their opponents 104-44. Three days later, a disappointing two point loss in overtime to Wesleyan diminished playoff hopes. The team, however, quickly rebounded with a surprising 68-67 upset over Mount Holyoke. Hedeman and Crouchley combined for 59 of the team's 68 points in the win.

After the Skidmore tourney, the squad can once again hope to qualify for the playoffs. Beasley said "that if we win five of our last six, we would have a chance at making it." The team travel to Trinity tonight.

Bolin fellow leaving town; racism is reason

by Karen Costenbader

Wahneema Lubiano, a Gaius Bolin Fellow at the college, has decided to turn down the position she was offered in the English department and to leave the Willlamstown area this summer.

In a letter to the editor of The Advocate, she wrote that her decision not to join the faculty at Williams College, "has to do with my child's life here in Williamstown." Her 11-year-old son, Jefe, "has been involved in a number of incidents with racial overtones after school and at the Williamstwon Youth Center."

Since their arrival here in September, Lubiano said, Jefe has been physically attacked and has been the subject of much "psychological, racial abuse" from children who attend his school and other teenagers as well.

Adult hostility

Lubiano says that the antagonism which her son received from his peers is not the only reason she wrote to The Advocate. In a specific incident at The Williamstown Youth Center, a community drop-in center for Williamstown youth, she said that she and her son felt the hostility of an adult for the first time.

A fight involving Jefe and two other boys took place at the Youth Center in late January. "The fight itself pales next to the behavior of the 'responsible' adult on duty at the Center during the time that Jefe was there," she wrote.

According to Lubiano, the adult on duty at the Youth Center told Jefe to keep his hands to himself and to leave and not come back.

Unsympathetic behavior

"At best, her behavior was unsympathetic, at worst it compounded the physical and emotional damage done to Jefe," she said. She added, "I've always told him that if he should get into such a situation, he should just run away and try to get an adult."

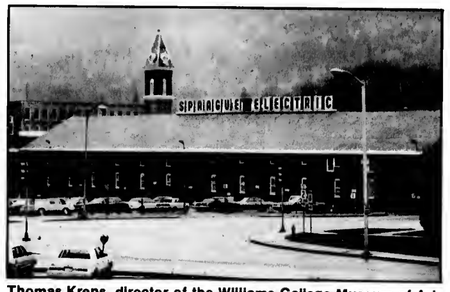
When Lubiano called the center after Jefe had come home crying with his clothing torn, she said that the same woman repeatedly interrupted her and then hung up.

Lubiano said, "In my conversation with her, I found her to be defensive, rude and insensitive. I doubt very much that the person with whom I spoke on the phone would have treated a white parent, however distraught or upset, with the same kind of contempt or rudeness."

In her letter, Lubiano wrote, "The racist behavior of white American children may even be attributed to their unconscious imbibing of the racism that is so much a part of the American fabric of life."

No excuse

"There is, however, no such convenient excuse for the behavior of the adult to whom I spoke and to whom, under normal and civilized circumstances, Jefe should have been able to look for help," the letter continued.



Although she praises the local public schools and the people with whom she has worked at Williams, Lubiano said she will be leaving the Williamstown area this summer because she feels it is a bad place for a black child to grow up.

She said, "Regardless of whatever has happened to anyone else, my experience has been bad enough to make it evident that there is racism here."

Lubiano came to the college under the Gaius Charles Bolin Fellowship for minority graduate students. The program, established by Francis Oakley at his induction as College President in October, 1985, is intended to encourage qualified minority students to pursue careers in college teaching.

The fellowship program is intended to have a dual purpose. In addition to assisting minority

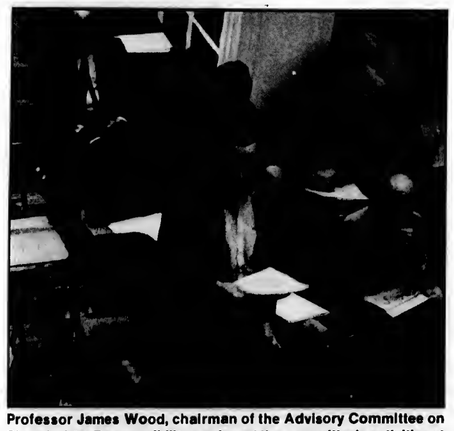
Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art, has for the past year developed a proposal for a museum that would occupy part of the Sprague Electric Co., shown above. The college would lend its artwork and faculty expertise to the museum.

Williams considers art museum in N. Adams

by John McDermott



For the past year, Williams College has assisted the City of North Adams and Sprague Electric Co. in developing a proposal for a museum of contemporary art in North Adams, college and city officials said last week.

A local landscape architecture firm was paid $25,000 to do conceptual drawings of the museum, College Treasurer William Reed said.

The museum, which the planners emphasize is only a concept, would occupy 300,000 square feet of Sprague's 750,000-square foot Marshall Street plant, which will be vacated by the company in July, Reed said.

Sprague, although involved in the discussions, has "made no commitments," he said.

Faculty discusses CEP proposals at its meeting

by Peter Balaban

The Committee on Educational Policy's (CEP) proposals to create tutorials and to revamp curricular divisions met with mixed reactions at last week's faculty meeting.

Also discussed at the meeting were the college's plans to use part of Hopkins Forest for faculty housing, and the upcoming renovation and expansion of Hopkins Hall.

CEP chairman Thomas Jorling began the discussion on the tutorial proposal by calling tutorials "almost the exclusive educational technique for centuries at Oxford" and asking for reactions to the proposal from the faculty.

"Romantic and naive"

History professor William Wagner labeled the proposal "romantic and naive in the extreme," maintaining that tutorials require too great a time commitment from faculty and students. Wagner called tutorials "bloody hard work" and said they would place "severe staffing constraints on the faculty."

College plans 6 houses in Hopkins Forest

by Debbie Snyder

The college plans to develop six building lots for faculty housing on 25 acres of the Lawrence Hopkins Memorial Experimental Forest, College Treasurer William Reed said.

Members of the Center for Environmental Study (CES), which manages the forest, had hoped that the college's recent acquisition of 200 acres on Pine Cobble for faculty homes would eliminate the need for any developing in the forest.

Reed said the lots, which will be ready for building this summer, will be used as a stopgap measure to fill the need for faculty housing until the recently purchased 200 acres on Pine Cobble are developed.

The area of Hopkins Forest that is to be developed is located on Northwest Hill Road across from an existing development created by the college in the 1970's. The new lots can be connected to the water and sewer systems used by the first development, allowing them to be ready for building sooner than the lots on Pine Cobble, Reed said.

Reed said that Pine Cobble will be developed and ready for building in 1989. "Pine Cobble will solve our problems in the long run," he said.

Reed acknowledged the concerns and objections of members of CES regarding any development of the land.

"We will try to come up with the plan that is the least offensive to the center," he said at last Wednesday's faculty meeting.

The college may develop a part of Hopkins Forest, above, which borders Northwest Hill Road, as lots for six faculty houses. (Albright)

Director of Hopkins Forest Henry Art said that when the first development was built on Forest Road, plans were made to build 15 lots on the other side of the road when the first development was filled up. The last lot was sold last spring.

"The center has been trying to get the various administra-

The Williams Record

Let this be the last time

After negotiations between the administration and members of the Center for Environmental Studies (CES), a plan emerged last week to subdivide 25 acres of Hopkins Forest into six house lots for faculty members.

Administrators said they regretted having to usurp forest land, but that the local housing crunch has been so acute, and faculty demand so strong, that there was no alternative. The land would be available much more quickly than land on North Hoosac Road for which the college recently signed a purchase agreement, they said.

In the process of consultation, CES faculty convinced the college to reduce the number of new homes from 15 to six.

It must have been a stressful discussion for both parties. Williamstown is a small town undergoing many pressures of growth. Tenured faculty, who have a commitment to stay at the college, need places to live. Some of those faculty may be members of CES. Housing in the central part of the town is often exhorbitant or unavailable.

The proposed house lots would lie near the intersection of Bulkley Street and Northwest Hill Road. Administrators said the development would be a companion to the Forest Hill homes east of Northwest Hill Road.

But Hopkins Forest is sacred land. The 2000-acre preserve was established for scientific experiments, which continue. It has also served exceedingly well as a recreational outlet for Williams students and other town residents.

It should be remembered that Hopkins Forest was created by the piecing together of a number of small farms over time. If the forest is to come apart, it could happen the same way: it could be eaten away, here and there, by piecemeal development.

The college should act now to prevent this. It should, assuming the development of these six homes is a forgone conclusion, pledge never to build in the forest again. Such a statement would reaffirm Williams' commitment to the forest, to scientific research and to its own environmental studies program. A college promise — in writing or in good faith — to leave the forest alone would let the community emerge from this stronger and more united.

Meanwhile, the college must seek new areas for faculty homes, or news types of housing. The North Hoosac Road development consists of 200 acres on Pine Cobble to be gradually developed into over 60 house lots. Even this may not be enough.

Creative solutions which take up fewer acres can be found. The college should recognize that some faculty, tenured and otherwise, would enjoy living in apartments or condominiums, if such units provided reasonable privacy and space. Not everyone wants or needs four acres and a mule. If anything that isn't a single-family house in the woods is frowned upon as temporary housing, then it is no wonder we have a crisis.

A broad base for CAP

One of the most powerful bodies on this campus is the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP). It is responsible for faculty hiring and tenure decisions. The CAP's judgments must go before the college trustees for final approval, but as committee members told the Record last week, a reversal of a CAP decision by the trustees would be very unusual.

It is this level of significance which makes the basis for membership in the committee a pressing concern. The CAP should receive input from a group of faculty members which is as diverse as possible, though it obviously must keep professors from decide on their own tenure.

The six-member committee is currently composed only of white males. Ex officio seats held by the College President Francis Oakley, Provost Neil Grabois, and Dean of the Faculty John Reichert. The three remaining seats are filled by vote of the faculty, with one professor representing each of the curricular divisions.

Elegibility to be elected to the CAP is restricted to full professors, which limiting the number of women able to serve to three and blacks to none.

This limit is unnecessarily exclusive. It restricts input which CAP could benefit from, especially from women and minority faculty. Membership should be opened to all tenured professors.

This would still insure that a faculty member would not sit on the committee as it decided his or her own future. As in other facets of the college community, pluralism and a sensitivity to minority concerns must find a place in the CAP.

Letters

BSU

To the Editor:

We, the Williams Black Student Union, are enraged over the increasing racial tension in this community. We would like to point out to members of the Williams Community that the climate at this institution is inconsistent with the policies of the school concerning education and the general well-being of its students. While the school has continually voiced concern about the problems that face minority students, it has failed to take an active role in the process of solving these problems.

We point to the patronizing student-teacher relationships present particularly in the Chemistry, Biology, Romance Languages, Mathematics, Economics, Psychology, and Physical Education Departments (This is not to the exclusion of othert academic departments.).

We point to the consistent harassment of black students by employees of the college who disrespect black students and deny their individuality.

We point to administrators who listen sympathetically but refuse to take the leadership necessary to actively combat racism.

We point to the ineffective bureaucratic Office of Affirmative Action which is structured on the basis of inactivity.

We point to the inadequate orientation of freshmen that begins a process of ignorance which culminates in the alienation of black students at Williams. The Freshman Days Program, the freshmen entry system, and the Junior Adviser system fail to address black concerns on campus and in American Society, thereby denying our very existence.

We point to an academic curriculum that perpetuates ignorance and white supremacy by denying the very existence of black and Third World scholarship.

We point to the increasing lack of racial tolerance in the white student population evidenced by the number of racially motivated incidents: threatening phone calls, white students accosting black students at Rice House, and actual physical violence.

Our immediate demands are as follows:

An immediate audience with President Oakley and Dean Fix at Rice House to discuss these and forthcoming demands.

The creation of a grievance committee to document, publish, distribute to the community, and answer complaints of racial intolerance.

An educational program on racism and intolerance to take place this semester with full participation by faculty, staff, students, and administrators.

The implementation of an educational program on racism during the freshman orientation process.

The installation of proper campus lighting and a campus-wide building security system.

Lubiano: "Racism has touched the life of my child"

by Wahneema Lubiano

I am the parent of an eleven year old boy, Jefe, who has been involved in a number of ugly and racist incidents here in Williamstown. As ugly as the behavior and racial attitudes of some of the children have been here, such behavior has been attributed to, or explained by, the ignorance and bigotry within the homes of such children. I know myself, however, that such behavior also occurred among the children of educated parents who think of themselves as well-intentioned and tolerant. The racist behavior of white American children, as well as that of many adults, may even be attributed to their unconscious imbibing of the racism that is so much a part of the fabric of American life.

I am writing to the Record both because what has happened is a Williams matter as much as it is a Williamstown matter, and because the previous article, as well as the responses (to which I have been listening since last Wednesday) to that article have given me cause for additional concern. The Advocate article encourages the propensity of some white readers to insist that behavior not be called racist unless all Black people in the community suffer the same kind of experience. The fact that the other two families contacted have not had the same kind of experiences here is simply beside the point.

Jefe, however, is not the only Black (or minority) person to have suffered here from some form of racism. People (who do not want their names printed in a newspaper) have called me to talk about instances of racist taunts and insensitivity directed at Black teenagers in the high school, as well as anti-Semitic physical and verbal abuse directed at Jewish children and teenagers.

It is not as important, however, to pile up testimony about other incidents of racism or anti-Semitism as it is to realize that the generalizability of Jefe's suffering is not at issue here. And the comparison of his experience to that of some other people of color could undermine a realization of the ugliness of his particular experience. That comparison could suggest that something objectionable and racial must happen to all people of color in order for one such individual to have a valid claim of mistreatment. Are we to understand, for example, that the thousands of lynchings that occurred in numerous communities across the United States had no validity as acts of racism because not every Black man, woman or child in those communities shared that fate?

Racism is not monolithic; numerous circumstances can intervene to mitigate its effects. Zora Neal Hurston once said that "white people think they already know the good Negroes" and it is the "bad new Negroes" who catch the heat. My son did not grow up here in Williamstown; he is very much a new kid. But a community is not considered tolerant simply on the basis of how it treats the Black people who have lived there for ten or fifteen years. In other words, the fact that the effect of racism is alleviated to some extent by other factors does not mean that it doesn't remain a problem for those who fall outside of the mitigating circumstances.

The tendency to demand that good treatment of one Black person renders invalid a claim of mistreatment from other Black people hit me even more directly yesterday morning. I was told that the Black Williams College students complaining about racism must be troublemakers because I had said that I like Williams and did not have the problems there that my som had had in the community. When I responded that not only do I occupy a privileged position in comparison to Black students at Williams — I have faculty status and contact with a relatively small and self-selected group of individuals — but that during the time that I was a graduate student (in a predominantly white institution) I had many of the same complaints, I was met with a blank stare.

I have been forced, by my visibility as a result of my willingness to go public with my concerns, to play the part of "native informant"; i.e., speaker for the whole race, at least here. Therefore, I'd like to say for the record: Whether anyone wants to admit it or not, and regardless of the number of individuals who have not been troubled with behavioral manifestations of it, racism is a problem here. Specifically, racism has touched the life of my child and it has hurt him.

After each ugly encounter, I have reiterated to Jefe what I have said to him, since he was five years old, about fighting and encounters of this kind: leave the area, run away if necessary, and find an adult for help. I have said this to him despite my own fear that an adult to whom he might turn may, in fact, be incapable (because of his or her own conscious or unconscious racism) of giving him the kind of on-the-spot help or attention he needs. Such an adult may, in fact, add to his hurt.

What any or all of the members of this community do about racism in this place is up to them; it is their responsibility. And people are capable of assuming that responsibility. I was cheered when I heard that some of Jefe's classmates decided that it was up to them to reprimand and educate the children they know have treated him badly.

For myself and my family, my decision to leave is not based on some foolish optimism that we are going to an area where such things won't happen, or where we will live only with other Black people. No, I'm simply hoping that the damage that racism inflicts on my son will be alleviated by a life in an area where there are more Black people — where he won't feel so isolated. As it is, I cope on a day-to-day basis with his repression of the hurt that he feels. When I try to get him to talk about what has happened to him, he refuses. His reply: "It's bad enough that it happened. It hurts to talk about it. It hurts to think about it. So I try to forget."

It's February; where are your New Year's Day resolutions?

by Nat McCormick '88

It's been a month or so since I made some New Year's resolutions over a glass or so of cheap champagne. They all concerned either getting organized, or gettig in shape, or pursuing one of those loud aspirations which always seem to recede into the future faster than their echo recedes into the past. The subsequent flashes of recollection, however, are as exposing as the guilty plastic film in your mouth the morning of a hangover.

As I plodded through dinner the other night, fortifying myself for a new week, I realized just how liver-spotted some of those resolutions were becoming. I was washing down my eleventh eclair with a glucosic glaze when a falling icicle caught my eye.

Outside, it's already February, but Old Man Winter still stands sentinel over the ground hog hole with a sawed off hockey stick. Just to spite him, I've been walking around in a pair of Bermudas and sockless loafers. Despite a fair amount of Cro-Magnon insulation, the breeze at twenty degrees has braised my bare skin with what might pass for a savage tan. When a radio voice predicts temperatures to soar one night, I ally myself with spring to spit in the ice of winter. By morning the air waves are full of snow. February has a long time yet to march.

Someone once called February the longest month. It was probably someone famous, who probably stated it in a much more refined way in the hopes that people would remember his or her name. I'm just paraphrasing something that struck me as meaningful, not only because I, too, have a mathematical deficiency, but because the past (and alternately the future) has a peculiar way of tapping on your shoulder when you're facing the other way.

It was the start of the term last year, and I had yet to buy any books, and yet to choose any courses. Over the break, I had bought some new stereo equipment, a sound, if expensive, investment. Once back, I was further greeted by a long-distance phone bill that reached out and decked me. What worried me most, however, was the proximity of Valentine's Day. With a bank statement of decimal points, I couldn't even afford a card. Gathering my wits and my roomate's book collection, I set out for the Pooh.

Half way there, I had an idea. Every year around Valentine's Day, my grandmother would tell me about the elaborate, hand-made cards she used to receive. I come from the type of New England family where fathers cultivate the work ethic in their progeny with snow shoveis and axes, so, with some slightly less cumbersome substitutes, I undertook the construction of a card. In short, it was a long process, and although my aspiration was elaborate — a classical extravaganza, filled with pop-up figures in all the romance of a Dionysian revelry (not to be confused with Bacchian sects) — the result looked decidedly handmade. To avoid the embarrassment of mailing it, I rationalized that it was probably too hot thematically for the Victorian palate. I forsook my laundry that week and splurged on a Hallmark.

Not long afterwards, I got a check from the Pooh. My roomate's mood would thaw in time, but a long, cold February had just begun.

A piece of ice rebounding off my forehead brings me back to the present, to the start of a new term and a potential food fight. I shake my head, relieved that this year I have already bought my books, settled my classes, and sent a Knock Out Valentine. I am also relieved that I don't have the chicken pox. I gracefully flume the residue of my indulgence and step outside into the crisp air.

It's already February, and time to celebrate Winter Carnival, time to celebrate the half way point between January and March, the past and the future. Accordingly, I'm designing a snow sculpture time machine that specializes in the present. In fact, the other morning at breakfast, after a few glasses of orange juice, I even considered making a few resolutions. From now on, I'll only be eating whole wheat eclairs. The Bermudas and loafers stay — Spring Break is only five weeks away.

Conference on black family and poverty

A four-day conference at the college on "The Black Family and the Feminization of Poverty" will bring together a group of experts on the subject.

These include Eleanor Holmes Norton, former Chair of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), poet June Jordan and Howard University psychologist Harriette Pipes McAdoo.

The conference, sponsored by the college's Afro-American Studies and Women's Studies programs, takes place February 25 through 28, and includes a number of panels on economic, social and cultural issues affecting black families in the United States.

205 Ephs donate to bloodmobile

The American Red Cross collected 286 pints of blood during the Bloodmobile's visit to Williamstown last week. Of the total, 205 pints came from Williams students. During the two-day drive, 59 people donated blood for the first time. One-gallon pins were awarded to Doug Hunt '89 and Paul Rardin '87. A 7-gallon pin was awarded to local attorney Bruce Grinnell.

The winner of Superman's Valentine's t-shirt was Susie Everett '89. Christopher Reeve's red scarf was won by Craig Breon '87.

In the vampire sweepstakes, East, with 28.3 percent of its residents participating, edged out A-Gar-Wood, with 26.5 percent. Other strong finishers were Pratt (23.9 percent), Morgan (21.4 percent), and Armstrong (21.1 percent). East and A-Gar—Wood will both receive prizes for participation greater than 25 percent.

Trustees OK the sale of Raytheon Stock

The Finance Committee of the Board of Trustees approved the sale of $820,000 worth of stock in Raytheon Company, College Treasurer William Reed said last week.

The sale of Raytheon, which has two South African operations, was recommended last month by the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR).

Reed said Saturday that he was unsure if the stock had been sold, but added that if it had not, it would be sold shortly.

At Wednesday's faculty meeting, ACSR chairman James Wood formally notified the faculty of the Raytheon recommendation, and he discussed the college's policy of disinvestment advocacy.

Reed told the faculty that the college will be exercising that policy — urging companies it owns to withdraw their holdings from South Africa — through shareholder resolutions during the upcoming proxy season.

Sawyer institutes new system

A computerized cataloging system will be tested for six months at Sawyer Library.

Four computer terminals in staff work areas will soon be linked to the system, named TOMUS, and developed by Carlyle Systems. The terminals are connected to computer system located in Albany. SUNY/OCLC, the bibliographic network to which the College Library belongs, is sponsoring the test program.

Users will be able to view the catalog records of the library through classifications such as title, author, subject and call number. The system has records of library collections acquired since 1983. The library's complete records are expected to be entered into the system within two years.

Library staff members will hold demonstrations of TOMUS for members of the campus community.

Chicken pox strikes several at Williams

by Jocelyn Shadforth

An epidemic of chicken pox has broken out at the college, according to Dr. James T. Corkins, director of Health Services. Fourteen cases have been diagnosed and more are expected.

In a letter circulated last Wednesday by the Health Services department, Corkins said that such an outbreak is not unusual for college-age students. Due to the two- to two and a half -week incubation period for the virus, he said he "wouldn't be surprised if we saw another little outbreak at that point."

According to the Health Services letter, the virus is most contagious in its early stages when symptoms are minimal. It is spread very easily through direct contact and through coughing and sneezing. A student who has already had chicken pox will not get it again.

Bed space has been expanded at the Health Center, but some students may be asked to convalesce in their rooms. Students with chicken pox have been asked not to participate in activities and not to attend classes. Recovery takes from ten to 14 days and, while chicken pox is not treatable, its symptoms are, under the care of a physician.

'Cauldron' showcases women's writing

by Paul Kwon

Cauldron, a new student publication, produced its first issue earlier this month.

The last page of Cauldron, a women's anthology, stated "The goal of our women's anthology is to encourage female artists and critics to create and to share their visions and perspectives with the Williams community."

Leslie Jeffs '89, one of the nine editors, cited the need for sensitivity for women's issues. Jeffs said that Cauldron was created "to create a place for women's writing that would add to the sensitivity given to women. I feel that it's our attempt to have an anthology for women."

Another editor, Mary Keller '87, said that the student body became interested after finding out what a women's anthology exactly is. "There were women who, after the first issue was printed, said, 'Wow, that's what a women's anthology is.'"

Men are permitted to write for Cauldron, although no men submitted works for the first issue. Said Jeffs, "Men's writing, in fact, any writing, would have to be relevant or of interest to women's issues."

For the first issue, 2500 copies were printed. The total cost of production was around $800. At last Thursday night's weekly College Council meeting, the council approved the Finance Committee's recommendation to give the Cauldron $150 in funding, by a vote of 28 to 4.

Asked if the money will be enough to pay for production, Jeffs said, "We definitely need more sources." These other sources will include campus organizations such as the Black Student Union, the Williams Gay and Lesbian Union, the Disarmament Forum, and the Feminist Alliance, she said.

Among the nine editors, no one is officially in charge of the paper. Lauri Puchall '87 said, "I was kind of in charge for the last issue, but we decided not to have an editor-in-chief to avoid creating a hierarchy."

Puchall presented the original idea for the paper to the Feminist Alliance. The Alliance assisted in bringing together the editorial staff. Writers were asked to contribute through the Daily Advisor and posters.

Cauldron is currently planning on publishing two issues a year and will review all work submitted by members of the Williams community.

185 want to be JAs next year

by F. Craig Gangi

The Junior Advisor selection committee received 185 applications from sophomores for 53 positions as next year's J.A.'s.

This year's selection committee changed the selection process somewhat in response to past criticisms.

Committee chairman Jim Reichheld '87, former president of the JA's, said the changes were designed to better inform applicants of the demands of being a JA and to allow every applicant an equal chance to become a JA.

One change this year was the enforcement of the mandatory pre-application orientation, held during the first week of Winter Study.

The orientation involved a panel discussion with former and present JAs, Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh, and Dr. John Howland, director of the psychological counseling service at the College Health Center. The panelists emphasized the responsibilities and time demands of being a JA.

Junior Advisor Claire Hsiang holds one of 53 positions coveted by 185 sophomores who applied to fill that role next year. (Rifkin)

Reichheld described a JA as being in a counseling position by "helping people find what is right for them at Williams." He said, "It is giving up a lot of your privacy and time with friends."

Students talk about gay life at Williiams

by Susanne Abell

The informal panel discussion "Perspectives on Gay Life at Williams" last Tuesday attracted many people. The atmosphere was relaxed, and there was a lot of laughter and applause.

The discussion started with a brief presentation by each of the five speakers, all Williams students, of his or her experiences with being homosexual and of coming out.

After these introductions, the speakers, three men and two women, went on to address the question of what it means to be gay, lesbian, or bisexual at Williams in particular.

Eliza Kent '89 said ,"If heterosexual sex at Williams is in a closet, then homosexual sex is in a shoebox at the back of the closet."

John Malcolm '88 said he found homophobia very strong here and said, "Certain places, like the weight room, are difficult for a gay male to hang out in."

Ed Stein '87 said, "Williams is okay in comparison to some places. Alabama would be terrible."

During a question-and-answer period, one person asked, "What are the advantages of being bissexual?" Stein and Erik Migdail '87 answered that the advantages are "having twice the group to chose from."

They said that it is a sort of liberation in that they view people as people and not as male or female. They said the main disadvantage is that they feel that neither homosexuals nor heterosexuals completely trust them.

Another question was how these people see the traditional family. All panelists said that they want to raise children, adding that they think children raised by gay parents do not

A new success story: lunch at the Log

by Beth Broadrup

The crowds you may have noticed forming on Spring Street around lunchtime this semester have not been waiting for special noontime matinees at Images and have not been rushing the Bank of New England. The source of this odd phenomenon is none other than the newly-instated lunch at the Log. Since the beginning of second semester, the Log has been open for lunch to students, faculty and staff from Monday through Thursday.

Members of the CUL Log subcommittee originated the idea of using the Log as a place where faculty and students could meet on a person-to-person basis, rather than a formal teacher-to-student one, over lunch. The committee hoped to attract large numbers of faculty and at the same time, as Log manager David Lamarre said, "give the Log a little injection of cash."

The Log serves lunch from 11:30 to 1:30. It works on a smaller scale than regular dining halls (no yogurt, granola, or peanut butter), but the daily menu features soup, a limited salad bar, sliced meat, cheese, breads, a hot entree, a dessert and nontraditional beverages. Students can use their I.D. cards to buy lunch just as they do in the dining halls.

Has the operation been a success? Although Lamarre admits to initial skepticism about students traveling down to Spring Street to eat on styrofoam plates at lunchtime, he was definitely more than pleased with the instant popularity of lunch at the Log among students.

Back to Baxter

The turnout so far has exceeded the Log's original estimate of student diners and has almost exceeded the Log staff's ability to handle the unexpected crowds. As of February 11, the number of students eating at the Log per day was 180. The Log had to temporarily close for 20 to 30 minutes at peak lunch hour a few times last week due to overcrowding and a lack of table space. Disappointed students were forced to head back to Baxter.

Under Lamarre and new supervisor Mike Cutler, the Log staff has been battling problems as they arise. Lamarre explained, "We've been playing it by ear and making adjustments" daily. The staff has eased its task by serving food that is easy to prepare and can be served quickly, prepping for the next day at night, changing the set-up to get people in and out faster, and looking for at least one additional part-time worker. Customer turnover at the Log was much better by the end of last week.

by Gayle Gaddis

"Images of Epidemic: A Day in the Life of a Generic Pox Patient." It's the tentative title for the upcoming made-for-TV movie based on the harrowing week of confinement of 12 Williams students. It tells how, one by one, the unsuspecting victims were drawn toward the health center that fateful Monday evening. "I have this bump in back of my ear," one said. "I think I'm getting the flu," said another. "What is this, acne?" But the problem was not one to be erased with benzoyl peroxide, despite the misguided efforts of some. No, what was encountered was the most uncomfortable and disfiguring childhood disease ever to hit the Williams College campus. It was, and still is, chicken pox.

Tuesday morning

7:41 a.m. I meet the doctor. I don't, in general, meet doctors before 8 a.m., but he doesn't seem to care.

8:15 a.m. They wake me to freshen my drinking water. I'm not drinking any, of course, because I'm asleep, but I imagine that fresh water should be a priority in my life.

8:30 a.m. They take my temperature. It seems official, so I bite plastic for a few seconds, then shrug it off and go back to Mel Gibson on a tropical island eating kiwi with chopsticks.

8:45 a.m. "What would you like for breakfast? We have toast."

10:00 a.m. They bring me toast.

10:35 a.m. I say "yes" to drugs. Benadryl, they say, stops the itching. Benadryl, I say, is a depressant. Why they assume depressed people don't itch is beyond the comprehension of anyone who hasn't figured out that childhood diseases are for children (i.e., short people who play with Masters of the Universe dolls).

11:30 a.m. My eyes are completely open. I discover seven other people roaming the halls, each with a complexion very similar to mine. I also discover the VCR. This is a big moment. I later discover that the VCR is the property of a quick-thinking survivalist, readying herself for the rough-hewn nights of chicken pox-dom. Much later, we all discover that she has "mild case" and will leave before any of us. The VCR stays.

2:00 p.m. I call my professors. They laugh. I call my friends. They laugh harder. In the next room I hear my neighbor calling her friends. They don't laugh; they haven't had it. She laughs.

Wednesday

9:30 a.m. I am awake, but I can't say much more for myself. There are 63 tiles in the ceiling.

9:30 p.m. We rent "The Breakfast Club." It hits a little too close to home. Not because we are a princess, a brain, a jock, a basket case and a criminal, but because we get high and dance down the halls. Just kidding.

The doctor buys us a pizza tonight. Or was it last night? Well, I know it was before the popcorn and after the MTV countdown. My life has become a continuous cycle of raisin toast and viewer mail, but somewhere in there I stop to think, "Wow, that was really nice. They're really good to us here."

Thursday

3:40 a.m. I turn over for the 57th time, wondering who shoved the sledgehammer down my throat.

4:30 a.m. I dream that I've been dipped in honey, covered with feathers and put in an air-tight room with 2,165 socially unadjusted fleas. Benadryl becomes my close friend.

2:00 p.m. I slowly pace the halls, not lifting my feet or noticing that my sweats are falling down around my ankies. Someone whines a garbled sentence at me. I grumble something unintelligible back, then grab my bear by the ear

North Adams State College

A bookkeeping mistake by last year's Student Government Association has put the organization over $10,000 in debt. According to Michael Kaczynski, SGA president, a requistion order which earmarks the money for a certain use was not sent out with last year's yearbook order. As a result, this money was believed to be unspent and was thus respent. This is not the first financial problem that the SGA has had recently; over the summer it discovered another accounting mistake made by last year's administration. Jim Gennari, SGA treasurer, said, "Our goal was to overcome the $18,000 deficit we were facing at the beginning of the year. We had almost gotten back to the break-even mark when this (yearbook mistake) was discovered."

Dartmouth

The Dartmouth recently reported several incidents of academic fraud across the country. A freshman at Florida State University was caught typing term papers on his computer and then selling them to his classmates for $15 to $30. Meanwhile, the Educational Testing Service has filed a $50,000 lawsuit against a California college student accused of arranging for high school students to take the S.A.T. for other students for a $100 fee.

More Dartmouth

Dartmouth College sophomore Timothy Light was charged by the Orford, N.H. police with serving three beers to each of four minors. Light said that he drove Jason Fox, the son of a family for whom he had been house-sitting, and three friends to a dance at Orford High School. A chaperone at the dance smelled beer on one of the minor's breath and Light was arrested soon afterwards. If found guilty, Light faces up to four years in prison and/or a $4000 fine.

Middlebury

On two consecutive nights during the third week of January, bomb threats were called into the Middlebury College switchboard. The first night the switchboard operator received a phone call from a female saying, "You had better get those f------ students out of Battell. There's a bomb in there." Battell Hall was evacuated immediately and a twelve hour vacancy of the building was ordered. Said one freshman: "You just don't expect a bomb threat at a place like Middlebury; a big city, yes, but not here." The next evening the switchboard operator received four consecutive calls from the same person who had called the night before about bombs placed in Stewart Hall. Because of the previous night's hoax and the voice identification, the administration refused to issue a mandatory evacuation order, although they encouraged any uncomfortable students to stay in another dorm for the evening. One student commented that, "At least it (the bomb scares) broke up the monotony of Winter term."

M.I.T.

A sign saying "Nerd X-ing" and depicting a walking figure wearing glasses and carrying a briefcase, a computer disc and what appears to be a slide rule, was recently put up near the 77 Massachusetts Avenue crosswalk. The M.I.T. Tech, in which a photo of the sign appeared, did not report how many nerds have been injured on that crosswalk.

Trinity

The Trinity College community has been plagued by a series of break-ins and thefts, all of which took place over the Christmas break. Between December 21 and January 5, the post office was broken into and $3000 worth of cash, money orders and stamps were stolen, and rooms in six dorms were burglarized. Of the six buildings burglarized, four were fraternity houses, from which were stolen stereos, cameras, a television, a VCR and power tools. "They obviously spent a couple of hours here. They played pool, they drank beer, and generally made themselves at home," said one resident.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Record reporter Michael Erard from material printed in other campus newspapers, unless otherwise noted.

The CAP: judge of the faculty

by Michael Erard

The functions of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) are, according to CAP member William DeWitt, "sensitive decisions about people's lives."

"The CAP has an immense amount of stuff to do," said member Jean-Bernard Bucky. "And it's not meditating and contemplating one abstract issue after another."

The CAP is a six-man group composed of professors DeWitt, Bucky and Gary Jacobsohn, and three ex officio positions filled by the President, the Provost and the Dean of the Faculty. As its title implies, the CAP is responsible for passing on appointment and promotion decisions: it interviews all visiting candidates for faculty openings and receives departmental recommendations for promotion, reappointment, and hiring of faculty members. It them makes recommendations to the Board of Trustees, which approves the CAP's decisions.

Curricular decisions

"It is certainly within the rules for them (the Trustees) to fail to accept the recommendations, but it doesn't," Jacobsohn said. Dean of the Faculty John Reichert said that the Board of Trustees would be the last authority if a situation that was impossible to resolve should arise, although it was "highly, highly unlikely" that the Trustees would refuse to promote or appoint a faculty member or candidate in a normal situation.

"We make curricular decisions through the appointment process," said Jacobsohn, pointing out that the CAP makes allocations within the faculty and determines which department can hire new members, which will be denied new members, and which will have its size reduced. The CAP also grants leave to faculty members.

The faculty members are elected to the committee by the faculty and serve a three-year term, each person representing one of the three curricular divisions. DeWitt is in his first year; Jacobsohn, his second; and Bucky his fourth.

Student roles

"This is not a committee on which students would be well-suited," Jacobsohn said. "The function assumes a certain level of expertise." He believes it would be "inappropriate for students to have roles and access to decisions that deal with the lives of faculty."

He said that student involvement in the hiring and promotion works better on a departmental level, citing the policy of the political science department (of which he is chairman) to have students sit in on interviews of candidates. Jacobsohn said, "Students are encouraged to report on experiences with faculty members when they feel strongly one way or another," adding that they should not necessarily wait until the time of a tenure decision. According to Bucky, all departments are required to show evidence of student evaluation of teaching.

"The (department) chairman is a central figure," Reichert said. It is he who is responsible for gathering student responses and interviews. If an ex officio student position on the CAP were created, he wondered how one student, appointed for one year and with no experience, could possibly represent the whole student body better than all of the responses from students gathered over the years.

Confidential

Although student input into their decisions is taken very seriously, all three professors feel that the CAP works best as the small confidential group that it is .

"There has been a feeling for a long time with decisions of this nature that they are best made by a small group of faculty and administrators where things can be kept confidential," DeWitt said.

"The dynamic of the group is such that, if it grows, it loses effectiveness," Jacobsohn said. The only reason he could give for expanding the committee was to spread the workload around and reduce time commitments, especially during January and February, when the committee meets for three or four hours a day.

"The bigger it is, the more unwieldy it is," Bucky noted. "It would be less efficient."

"I see no good reasons to expand the committee either from a representational point of view or a point of view of committee efficiency," Jacobsohn concluded.

Homogeneity

The CAP's homogeneity is "a concern all of us share," Bucky said. "I have no doubt that will change, very, very soon." He gave this 6 or 7 years to happen.

"Some of it is a problem of democratic representation," Jacobsohn said, pointing out (as did DeWitt, Bucky and Reichert) that one qualification for election to the CAP is full professorship. There are few women full professors and no black full professors. Besides this point, he said, "there is nothing to prevent the election of blacks or women to the committee."

"All institutions are looking for blacks and women, and when we offer them jobs often they don't come here because another institution has made them a better offer," DeWitt said. He also commented that people may not want to come to Williams for reasons that Williams has no control over, such as the social atmosphere (especially for singles), and the concerns of a spouse.

Women and minorities

"There's no institution that is doing as well as it would like in this (women and minority hiring) aspect," Jacobsohn said. Consideration for an ex officio member for women and minority concerns is based on the assumption that the CAP does not address fully or consider minority and women concerns, Jacobsohn said. "I don't accept that assumption ... and therefore don't accept the proposal." He said that the CAP is encouraging departments "to maximize opportunities and possibilities for blacks and other minorities to become part of the faculty."

"I would expect in the next few years when they (women) become eligible , one or more will be elected," DeWitt said. Only recently have a significant number of women been on the faculty, he noted. "They are coming up in the ranks," he said. Women have been elected to similar posts on committees which do not require all members to be full professors, he said; for example, Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemary Tong has been elected chairperson of the faculty Steering Committee several times.

Music department presents evening of charming music

by Alexandrea Oh

The Williams College Department of Music opened its second semester of events with a chamber music concert on Friday, February 13, in the Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

The concert featured Julius Hegyi, the music director, on violin, Janet Rowe on violin and viola, Eleanor Howells on cello and Charlotte Hegyi on piano. The repertoire included Beethoven, Sphor, Martinu and Tomasi.

Tantalizing and lulling

The Martinu Duo in C Major for violin and cello opened the concert; Julius Hegyi and Eleanor Howells worked together wonderously to create a disonant yet melodic sound. The tantalizing and lulling sound of the Preludium was in stark contrast to the delightfully light and humorous march of the Rondo; the two performers complemented each other's styles, Hegyi's lightheartedness balanced by Howell's rhythmic backdrop.

Hegyi was then joined by Janet Rowe in Louis Sporh's Duo for Two Violins. The typically romantic sound of the Allegro was reminiscent of a waltz; the two players seemed to experience trouble at some part in staying together, as the melody became choppy and a bit forced. Larghetto, however, was performed flawlessly, with Hegyi leading the tranquil, yet pleading, melody. The two players then interchanged delightful frolicking melodies in the Rondo. The Spohr lent the performance its needed charm and put smiles on the faces of the audience.

Beethoven lacking

On the other hand, the Beethoven was clearly the low-point of the performance. Although the husband and wife team of Julius and Charlotte Hegyi worked together without any obvious faults, the performance somehow lacked the life and fire inherent in Beethoven sonatas. The entire performance was marred by seemingly hesitant performances on the part of the players; the Allegro con brio especially lacked the liveliness it needed to maintain the attention of the audience.

The closing piece, Tomasi's Divertissement, was a sharp contrst to the Beethoven, as the creativity of Tomasi was well carried through by the team of Julius Hegyi, Rowe and Howells. The Finale especially was brilliantly performed with the right amount of cheekiness, and was the perfect close to an evening of charming music.

4:00 p.m. It's our fifth hour of MTV and our nineteenth complexion joke since Tuesday night. "Sure, Mattie's sleeping with some astronaut who sells Coors in his spare time, sure she's stepping on David's face and ripping his heart out through his nostrils, but hasn't she got great skin?" It's not funny, but eleven people (the "mild case" has gone home by now) who'd be happy to look like Boris Karloff on a bad day find it hysterical.

safety of red trays and the flume? Most are just plain students looking for some lunchtime variety. Lamarre noted that a lot of Morgan and Hoxsey Street residents are heading for the Log instead of other dining areas. Most students come with friends, not usually with faculty as the CUL committee had hoped. Still, Lamarre is very happy with the Log's success.

Green lettuce

He is not the only one. Students who have ventured out into the uncharted lunchtime waters at the Log had nothing but praise for the experience. Amid subdued music and student conversations, Jonna Hooker '90 suggested that "the atmosphere is more like a restaurant than a dining hall." Katie Gormley '90 explained that the Log is particularly alluring to her. "It's the only place on campus where you can get real food. The lettuce is green!" But perhaps most substantial proof of the Log lunch's popularity among students can best be summed up by the advice of a group of Quad freshmen: "Make it a franchise!"

tions to cancel those plans or to think of providing alternative lots for housing faculty," Art said.

But, he said, "The administration felt considerable pressure to build house lots, and it's a fairly lengthy process geting Pine Cobble approved by town boards."

Reed said a severe shortage in housing exists in Williamstown, and the houses are overpriced. For these reasons, he said, the administration decided to make a few lots immediately available to faculty, although the college has Pine Cobble.

The land to be developed, Reed said, "is a little used portion of the forest" and, "It is not key land for experimental research.". He noted that the college has added 400 acres to the forest in the last four years.

Art said, "The area to be developed is not on the main watershed area." "The loss of isolation is much more of a concern than the loss of the absolute acres," he said.

He said that the new lots will be on the same side of North west Hill Road where much experimenting occurs, and that CES will try to construct a barrier between the development and the forest. "We don't want a lot of trails running willy-nilly from people's houses," he said.

JA selection

chance to become a JA. A common criticism of the selection process in the past has been that applicants unknown to committee members had a poor chance of becoming JA's.

"Some people are less visible, less mainstream and overlooked," Reichheld said.

In the interview process, two members of the selection committee interviewed four applicants at the same time. Interviewers could not be sophomores or former JA's of an applicant. Although interviews were used several years ago, they failed because the interviewers were biased and the committee didn't know how to use the results, according to Reichheld.

Positive responses

This year the interviews were used in part to clear up any discrepancies in a candidate's application. After each interview, the applicant was asked to write a brief review of how he or she felt it went and how heavily it should be weighed in the selection process.

"I do think it is a good thing for those who maintain a low profile to be seen and heard," one applicant wrote.

"Discussing different scenarios was challenging both in considering my own potential reactions to certain problems and in hearing others," wrote another.

Some of the sophomores wrote that the interviewers often seemed to be looking for a certain correct answer.

"I think we're getting a better look at a less mainstream crowd," Reichheld said.

Committee composition

The formation of the 25-member selection committee was altered this year, so that each of what may be called the "executive" members had veto power over the other people's nominations to the committee.

The selection committee consists of 12 JAs from last year (including Reichheld and Deb Gordon '87, vice-chairman of the committee), nine students, mostly sophomores, chosen by the College Council and four present JAs, including JA President Nicole Melcher '88 and Vice-President Kim Hatch '88.

The executive committee is comprised of Reichheld, Gordon, Melcher, Hatch, College Council President Amy Jeffress '87 and Vice-President Suzanne Blemiller '87.

The Selection Committee meets five nights a week for three hours to make their selections. The group, which began meeting on February 8, is in the preliminary stages of a three-step process.

In the first stage all applications are read aloud, and a non-binding vote is recorded. Next, each application is reviewed, and a binding vote is taken. In this step, a candidate needs a two-thirds majority to move on to the final selection step. In the third stage a final vote is taken in which each committee member brings his or her top choices to the dean's office for final tabulation.

Another area of change is in the application that sophomores must complete. In past years there was only one question, asking the applicant to discuss his strengths and weaknesses. This year a second essay question was added, requiring applicants to discuss a problem that they might encounter while serving as a JA.

Along with the application, a sophomore must submit a peer reference and a recommendation from a present or former JA.

The final goal in the process is to select an even number of male and female JA's. With 114 male and 71 female applications, a sophomore woman has better than a one-in-three chance of being selected and a sophomore male less less than a one-in-four chance. The final decisions will be made by the week before spring vacation.

US Ambassador speaks on Chile

by Philippe Heller

Harry G. Barnes, the U.S. ambassador to Chile since November 1985, spoke optimistically on the political situation in Chile to about 50 Williams students and faculty last Wednesday.

Barnes caught the audience's attention by stating, "The present (Chilean) government has announced that there will be a transition to democratic government by the 11th of March, 1989."

According to the ambassador, this political change is to come under the form of a nation-wide referendum during the spring of 1989. He said the candidates for this referendum will be designated by the government.

Barnes said he found in Chile more freedom than he had expected in a Latin American country. Although he said, "There are very serious problems of human rights in Chile," Barnes maintained that there is a higher degree of freedom in the country than in Eastern European communist states.

Barnes supported his statement by noting that some areas of the press, such as radio stations, are relatively free and, "There are ways people can criticize the government." He also said, however, that "At the moment in Chile, opposition parties exist but are not legal."

Another positive element in Chile, the ambassador said, is the good state of the economy. With inflation at 17 percent, productivity and production on the rise since 1984,the country seems to have temporarily left behind the difficult years of the early 1980's when, Barnes said, Chileans showed an "obvious lack of skill in managing financial issues".

Barnes concluded that the turmoils in Chile were more the result of a "political dissatisfaction than an economical one."

Harry Barnes talks about his experiences as U.S. ambassador to Chile last Wednesday. (Hazen)

Barnes said that the current economic progress as well as the democratization project put in place by the Chilean government might "provide a boost in the 1989 plebiscite in (President Augusto) Pinochet's favor."

He said that there is among opposition factions a growing dissatisfaction regarding Pinochet's general attitude on human rights. He also said that he had felt during his 15-month stay in Chile a growing tiredness of the people at having Pinochet as a leader.

Finally, answering several questions by Williams students on the American government's policy in Chile, Barnes said , "Our policy is to encourage a greater respect of human rights and a meaningful transition to a real democracy."

students in the completion of their doctoral dissertations, it offers fellows the opportunity to teach one course in a particular department. In this way, they are allowed to work and live in a small liberal arts college in the hope that they will become interested in college teaching.

Nancy McIntyre, special assistant to the president, commented, "We are pleased that the experience for Wanheema Lubiano, in terms of faculty, students, and the public schools, has been a positive one. We regret that Jefe was the subject of remarks and behavior that we wish did not exist.

"It is hard to know what it (Lubiano's experience) portends for future Bolin scholars," McIntyre continued. "What we will have to emphasize is the opportunity the fellowship provides to work with challenging students and faculty, and excellent services, and hope that community supports will be available.

Lubiano plans to accept a position at the University of Texas at Austin. "I never thought that I'd end up in the South," she said. "I know its not going to be perfect, but what makes it worse is that he hasn't seen other black children around to hang out with. In all the schools (in Texas), Jefe will have a mix of all types."

For herself as well, she says, "Part of what was so difficult was that I thought I was talking into a blank slate. Each time something like this happens here, people act horrified and as though it's never happened before."

On Tuesday, Williams lost to the second-ranked Division I team, Trinity, 7-2, with freshmen Susie Piper and Sarah Fulkerson winning 3-2 matches.

Because of these strong showings, the team moved up to the number nine national ranking.

The 12-8 Ephs play their last home match today at 7:30 before wrapping up the regular season at Tufts on Saturday.

Museum as magnet

Reed said that under the proposal, the museum would serve as a magnet for professional firms, which could locate in an office complex also on the site.

According to Reed and North Adams Mayor John Barrett III, the idea originated about a year ago with Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA). Krens was out of town and unavailable for comment.

"It's still just an idea," Barrett said. "There is so much more that has to be explored."

No financial plan

As evidence of the preliminary nature of the idea, Barrett said there is no plan for how the project would be financed. Reed said Krens' idea calls for a non-profit organization, established by the college, company and city, to own and operate the museum.

The museum would draw on the staff and expertise of the WCMA, but would not be financially supported by the college, Reed said.

"Williams College (has) a tremendous amount of untapped expertise in many areas," Barrett said. "As for monetary considerations, that's not what it's all about."

Trustees haven't approved

The idea was presented to college trustees at their January meeting, Reed said, but he added that the trustees did not vote to approve the plan, and have not scheduled a future vote on the subject.

The city and college intended to announce the idea 60 to 90 days from now, according to Barrett, but the college's interest in the Marshall Street complex was reported in last Wednesday's Advocate, and other local media soon provided details.

"It would have been announced after we had a better handle on the financing of it," Reed said.

Krens looked at two other buildings in North Adams, the Windsor and X-Tyal mills, but decided the Sprague complex was the best site for a museum, Barrett and Reed said.

Unite collections

Reed said Krens envisioned the museum as a place which could unite contemporary art collections loaned from a number of museums, including the WCMA.

"He realized that one of the common problems museums have is that they can only display a fraction of their collections," Reed said, "especially when it comes to large sculpture and contemporary art."

WCMA Assistant Director W. Rod Faulds said that more than half of the college museum's collection is currently in storage. But he added that such a ratio is not always considered unusual or negative in a museum of art.

In comparison to the 300,000 square feet of floor space available in the proposed museum, the WCMA has about 20,000 square feet of exhibition space in a building with a total of about 55,000 square feet, Faulds said.

Reed said he did not know whether Krens had discussed his idea with representatives of other museums, but said that "the museum directors of the country tend to know each other well."

The college contracted Harry Dodson of Dodson Associates Landscape Architects, of Ashfield, to draw interior and exterior views of the buildings which would house the museum, Reed said.

The firm was paid $25,000 out of a fund established by Sprague Electric for the now-defunct Croissant Club, Reed said. The club, organized by an executive of the company, was a group of local business and community leaders who met to discuss the state of North Adams' economy after Sprague began to lay off hundreds of its employees in 1985.

Barrett said the Marshall Street plant is probably at the end of its use as an industrial space, although he said the buildings are in good condition. He said it would be difficult to locate a small machine shop in part of the plant because the complex has only one heating system.

Embrace tourism

On a larger scale, Barrett said that North Adams must realize that manufacturing can no longer be its primary employment base, and that the city must appeal to the tourism industry.

"I have accepted the fact that manufacturing jobs have declined in the United States and will continue to do so," he said. "We can't keep the image of a mill city. It's got to move away from that."

Barrett said Krens' idea "seemed far-fetched" at first. "But everybody studied it and we became excited about it," he said.

"This is still a long shot, as something of this magnitude would be," Reed said. "If it doesn't work, Williams' reputation could be damaged a little bit. To have it work, it's got to be absolutely first rate."

Sprague Electric officials in Lexington were unavailable for comment on the idea over the weekend.

Faculty meeting

The Oxford system, which served as a rough model for the CEP draft, would be inadequate at Williams because, unlike Oxford, tutorials here would be graded, Wagner said. He added that "some students might not be pleasant to teach in this format."

Jorling said that tutors in the Williams-Oxford program have been grading students for a year and "the grading aspect by tutors seems to be a possibility."

"Intellectual intimacy"

Philosophy professor Peter Lipton said that tutorials offer an "extraordinary opportunity for intellectual intimacy." Lipton said that he felt that the workload for a tutorial would be the same as a normal course because the focus of a tutorial is a student's work.

Dean of the Faculty John Reichert, a member of the CEP, wanted to know if the faculty felt that tutorials were something worth working on, aside from workload and staffing implications.

Gordon Winston, professor of economics, said that a response such as "Gee, this sounds really great, go to work on it," would be easy to get from the faculty, but it is worth working the details such as staffing implications out before making a decision on the proposal.

Increase in requirements

The faculty also responded to the CEP's proposal to increase distributional requirements to include a lab science and two courses in foreign languages, literatures, and cultures.

Art professor Matthew Rohn said he saw the distribution proposal as an attempt to increase enrollment in certain departments and decrease it in others at the expense of educational goals.

Kim Bruce, a mathematics professor, said, "(The) proposal is basically a sound improvement over what we have now." Bruce said he felt that there should also be a requirement in quantitative or computational skills. He added that banks and investment houses, traditional employers of Williams graduates, look for experience in quantitative reasoning.

Philosophy professor Laszlo Versenyi said that he opposes all division requirements. He said he opposes a quantitative skills requirement, because "all students (at Williams) can add and subtract — if not they can buy a little three-dollar calculator." Versenyi said that the CEP document was very badly thought out and that the distribution requirement was a "pure euphemism."

Hopkins Hall renovation

In other business, College President Francis Oakley informed the faculty of the Board of Trustees' recent approval of funding for working drawings for the renovation of Hopkins Hall. Oakley said the proposal tentatively includes an addition on the north side of the building.

The renovated building would provide a long-term solution to the problem of administrative office space and contain at least eight classrooms, said Oakley. The renovation and extension would probably be completed by the 1989-90 academic year, according to Oakley.

College Treasurer William Reed informed the faculty of the college's purchase of 200 acres on Pine Cobble mountain. Reed said the college would develop the land into 60 plots which will be available for purchase by college faculty and staff, beginning in the spring of 1989. He added that the college will "try not to destroy the character of the mountain" while developing the plots.

Reed noted that the college is considering developing six building lots in Hopkins forest to ease the housing crunch while the Pine Cobble plot is being developed. He said he met with members of the Center for Environmental Studies and that the administration will try to "come up with the plan that is least offensive to the center."

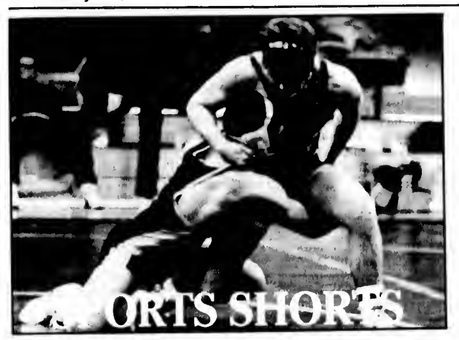
Then get in on the ground floor in our undergraduate officer commissioning program. You could start planning on a career like the men in this ad have. And also have some great advantages like:

- Earning $100 a month during the school year
- As a freshman or sophomore, you could complete your basic training during two six-week summer sessions and earn more than $1100 during each session
- Juniors earn more than $1900 during one ten-week summer session
- You can take free civilian flying lessons
- You're commissioned upon graduation

If you're looking to move up quickly, look into the Marine Corps undergraduate officer commissioning program. You could start off making more than $17,000 a year.



We're looking for a few good men.

Williams' much improved women's basketball team suffered one of its most disappointing loses of the season last Tuesday night at Trinity. The Lady Ephs lost not only a 72-62 game, but all chances at making post season play.

The Trinity game was a close one throughout but weak Eph scoring down the stretch made the difference. Near the end of the game, Nancy Hedeman '89 who had 23 points on the day, was tightly checked, and the rest of squad could not provide the necessary balance in the final minutes.

Defensively, the Lady Ephs switched between a man-to-man, special zones and a full-court press. Their defense was usually effective, but near the end outside shooting by the Bantams opened the lead that sealed the victory.

Throughout the season, the hoopsters have marveled at their success, already having won three times as many games as last year's squad. Much of the team's prosperity can be traced to the consistently strong performances of sophomores Hedeman and Missy Crouchley, and junior Kim Hatch. The return of this trio of stars next year should make for an even more successful team next year.

W Hockey

Junior goalie Daisy Hagey finished her season in fine form Saturday, posting her second straight shutout, as the women's hockey team beat homestanding Wesleyan. The standout goalie, who will miss the last two games for a semester at sea, stoned Cardinal shooters at every opportunity in avenging the Ephs' earlier 3-2 loss to Wesleyan.

Catherine Eaton '88 opened the scoring at 16:58 of the first period, assisted by seniors Leslie Fernandes and Kirsten Rooks. Fernandes followed with her fourth goal of the season with an assist from Michelle Barry '87, her 14th on the year. Rooks, the leading scorer, finished the scoring with her eighth goal of the season off passes from Eaton and Fernandes. Coach Jim Briggs said he was extremely pleased with the play of his potent front line.

Earlier in the week, the team shutout R.P.I. 2-0 at Chapman Rink, their second win of the season over their Empire St. foes. Haley Clifford '87 scored unassisted and Sarah Shuil '88 added her seventh goal of the campaign, assists coming from Barry and Fernandes.

The 8-5 pucksters travels to UConn tonight and conclude the season against Boston College at home on Saturday at 2:00.

Wrestling

The wrestling team traveled to Bowdoin last weekend hoping to obtain some momentum heading into this weekend's Little Three showdown with Wesleyan and Amherst. They failed to do so, as the Polar Bears defeated the Ephs 25-18. The lone Williams win on the mats came from Mark Duff '89 who pinned his opponent in the first period.

John Mackie '90 and 167-pounder Will Lafave '90 both wrestled well despite losing close matches. According to Duff, "Will and John both wrestled great and could have won. If they keep it up, we can beat Amherst." The other Eph points came from Steve Felix and Ed Anderson, who got 12 points on forfeits.

Although the Bowdoin match did not prove profitable for the Ephs, the Amherst match appears to be winnable. Felix and Anderson are coming into their own. Necessary for victory will be standout perfromances by Duff and co-captain Dan MacDonnell '87, who has had problems all year with making weight.

Wesleyan, on the other hand, is another story. The Cardinals have overwhelmed their Division III foes with ease this season, and also have beaten Penn, a Division I team. Consequently, a Little Three Title might be far-fetched but a split is very possible.

Men's hoops set to challenge Amherst

by Stewart Verdery

After a split of last week's road contests, the men's basketball team faces a crucial week. Wins over Middlebury and Amherst could make the 11-6 Ephs a prime candidate for an ECAC playoff berth: a loss will likely eliminate Williams.

After travelling to Middlebury, an earlier victim of the Ephs, the hoopsters roll out the 'welcome mat' for the Lord Jeffs Saturday, as Amherst visits Lasell Gymnasium for the final time. The defectors beat Williams 88-75 in January, with a strong first half standing up in the face of a late Eph comeback. Jeff star Yram Groff erupted for 32 points, and the Ephs could not effectively handle a half-court press. Look for a small Eph lineup with increased playing time for Mike Masters and Bill Meichionni and a box-and-one defense to stop Groff.

"Amherst is not that good," said freshman point guard Garcia Major. The anticipated capacity crowd should "rattle the Jeffs." A win over the Jeffs, ranked 13th nationally in Division III, would do wonders for the team's very iffy playoff hopes.

Last Saturday, the Ephs went to Tufts and returned losers by a 80-75 count. After falling behind by a dozen at halftime, the Ephs pulled within one late in the second half before falling by five. "We came out pretty flat and played with little intensity," said Major.

The loss to Tufts followed a come-from-behind victory against Trinity. Major poured in 14 of his 20 points in the second half to help erase a six point Bantam margin at the break.

The Ephs fought back, and finally took the lead shortly after standout Bantam guard Mike Donovan fouled out at the five minute mark. Free throws down the stretch by Henry Jones '88 (19 points) and senior Greg Lang (16 points, 12 rebounds) sealed the win. The comeback was accomplished without a single point from seniors Brandt Johnson and John Ciulla, who were averaging 30 points per game between them.

From The Locker Room

Al on Larry Bird

Let's get this straight. I am not a Larry Bird fan. Nor do I like the Celtics. Still, I must admit that Larry Bird is the greatest player in the game today.

Bird has won the M.V.P. trophy the past three seasons and is once again one of the top competitors for the award this year. Maybe Magic makes flashier passes, Jordan scores more, or Dominique dunks better, but no one is better all around than Bird. When he came to the Celtics as a rookie, he entered a team that finished twenty games below .500 the year before. At the end of his rookie season the Green had made it to the conference finals and had amassed over 50 regular season wins. No current player has ever made such an immediate impact on his team.

Statistically, Bird is clearly one of the best in the league, averaging close to 27 a game, pulling down nine boards and dishing out about seven assists. However, it is Bird's ability to make his teammates better that distinguishes him from the rest of the NBA's elite. He can morally decimate a team with his play, which traditionally improves as the importance of the moment grows. Perhaps McHale, Parish, and DJ are frequent all-stars, but I doubt if they would be nearly as effective on another team without Bird's influence.

Stu on Magic Johnson

Larry Bird has been a great player as evidenced by his three MVP awards. However, his reign atop the NBA is over. The new occupant of the title is Bird's old and current nemesis, Earvin (Magic) Johnson.

Bird fans point to the Celts team success as an indicator of his value. But check out Magic's record: three NBA titles, six conference crowns, and an NCAA winner. Bird fans point to his ability to make teammates better. Magic really only has two quality teammates in Worthy and Kareem, while the hick from French Lick plays with perennial all-stars in Bobby P., McHale and DJ. Bird fans point to his 'great' stats. But his numbers as compared to other forwards in areas like shooting percentage and rebounds are less impressive than Magic's 53% from the floor and seven rebounds per game. The man from Michigan State also is the league leader in assists almost every year, while Bird's asssist totals don't reflect his astronomical turnover figures.

Sunday's action clearly illustrated the trend that Johnson and the Lakers usually get the best of Bird and company. Ever since the 1979 NCAA tourney, Magic just seems to play a little better when things are important. Come May, Mr. Johnson will be the owner of the MVP, not Bird.

Icers avenge Panther loss with 5-3 win

by Al Mottur

Gaining revenge from an earlier 7-1 rout at the hands of the Panthers, the men's hockey team edged Middlebury 5-3 Friday night at Lansing Chapman Rink and in the process snapped a debilitating four-game winless streak. The home win pushed the Ephs' record to 6-11-2 and left the squad just two wins short of presenting Coach Bill McCormick with his 300th career win.

The victory was the squad's fifth at home this year against six losses and marked the drastic dichotomy the team has displayed between playing at home and on the road where it sports a poor 1-5-2 record. McCormick thought that the vast difference between the home and away records resulted from the pressure the players felt by playing at home: "They don't want to be embarrassed in front of their fans, whereas on the road, mistakes aren't noticed."

Sophomores, seniors key win

McCormick cited the play of two lines as instrumental to the win which provided "bragging rights to Route 7." The sophomore line of Chris Conway, Will Putnam and Mike Swenson combined for a Swenson power play goal and played well the whole night. "I felt really confident with them," said the coach. "Whenever they play well on the power play, it seems as if their whole game improves."

The other line which keyed the win, according to McCormick, was the senior trio of Denny Wright, Chris Traggio and Craig Cheevers. Traggio, the senior winger who pocketed the opening goal just nine seconds into the game, later added an assist and an empty net tally. Wright, the center, who McCormick called "one of the most courageous hockey players on the team," added two assists of his own, and Cheevers scored once and continued his fine all-around play.

After the Traggio tally just seconds into the contest, the Panthers pushed two first period goals past goaltender Mark Morrison '88, and held a 2-1 lead entering the second period. From then on, the game belonged to the Ephmen. Outscoring Middlebury 4-1 in the second and third periods, the squad pounced upon Panther mistakes and avoided making too many of its own.

Tied at three entering the final period, Williams took the lead when defenseman Tim Frechette '89 tipped a Denny Wright slapshot into the net less than a minute after play had resumed. The lead held up the rest of the way as Williams avoided the self-destructive mistakes that have traditionally plagued them throughout third periods this year. And with ten seconds to play, Wright took a pass from Frechette and slipped the puck to Traggio who sent it into the empty goal for the final margin of victory.

Second loss to Hamilton

Prior to the satisfying Middlebury win, the squad got pounded by Hamilton 9-3. The road loss last Tuesday night marked the second loss the Ephs have suffered to the Continentals this season. The squad was beset with numerous man-down situations which resulted in six power play goals for the Continentals, who led 5-0 after the first period.

Tonight, the Ephs host Babson who will make the trek from Wellesley, carrying with them the third place ranking in ECAC East. On Friday, the home campaign will conclude when Westfield State comes to Billsville. The team's season ends a week from tonight when it travels to Salem State.

Swimmers snare Little 3

by Kurt Oeler

In his 21 years at Williams, Coach Carl Samuelson's swim teams have built a reputation throughout New England for their sterling season-ending performances. Saturday, the men's and women's squads continued this tradition with momentum building wins against the Wesleyan Cardinals. The men's marked their unprecedented fifteenth Little Three title.

Both teams blitzed Wesleyan in the tuneup meet for the championship season. Jen Raymond '87 led the Ephwomen with wins in the 100 and 200 freestyles. Distance swimmers Suz MacCormac '88 and Jean Lemieux '89 swept the 500 freestyle, and Connie Davis '90 won the IM. The win leaves the women's record at 6-4.

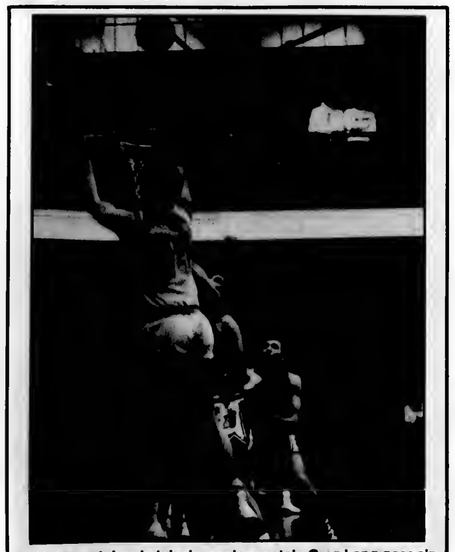
Senior Scott Robinson closed his dual meet career at Williams with victories in the 200 and 500 freestyles. Will Dudley '89 took the 400 IM, and classmate Evan Davis captured the 100 breast in 1:01.02, 0:00.02 shy of the national qualifying mark. Freshman Chris Cleurzo added a win in the 100 fly. Williams finishes the season at 5-3.

While the men have this week off to prepare for their New England championship meet in two weeks, the women go to Wellesley this weekend for the New Englands. Defending champion Tufts, led by All-American Ann McCann, Bowdoin and Amherst will battle to stop Williams from improving on last year's third-place finish.

In addition to senior co-captains Joan Horgan and Jen Raymond, the Ephs will depend on a talented freshman class that includes Berne Brody, Michelle Freemer, Lisa Gauthier and Anne MacEachern. Raymond summed up the Ephs' chances: "We have a long-shot to win, but Joan (Horgan) is all set to win the swimmer of the meet award." A year ago, Williams' Kathy Kirmayer won the award, given annually to the swimmer who scores the most points over four years.

Ninth-ranked women's squash beats Wesleyan

by Marc McDermott



After a two-year absence from the Purple Valley, the Little Three women's squash title has returned to Williamstown. Led by seniors Amy Barstad and Gigi Madore, the Ephwomen invaded Wesleyan to dominate the Cardinals before wresting the crown from the hated Lord Jeffs of Amherst with a 7-2 victory.

Number nine player Nancy Shore said the team's attitude was key: "The team was really up to win. We all had positive attitudes going in, and our attitudes didn't let us down. We just played real well and won. The scores speak for themselves."

The Wesleyan match was never in question as the Ephs dismissed the Cardinals in workmanlike fashion, dropping only two games along the way. The Amherst meeting was not so easy, for although the Ephs shut them out just last Saturday, the Lord Jeffs refused to go down without a fight. The Ephs suffered stunning upsets to number one Jeanne Cloppse '88 and number five Beth Gavrin '88 before settling down and taking the rest of the contests by identical 3-0 scores.

"It was a really big win for us," said Coach Renzie Lamb, "since Amherst beat us by one point in 1985 and then upset us again last year. It was really great to get them back, espe-

Women win big in Union Invitational

by Steve Brody

The women's indoor track team showed its strength at the Union Invitational on Wednesday and came away with a victory over their four competitors. Williams had 142 points to Albany State's 106 and Union's 82, with Hartwick and Siena far behind.

The meet was filled with many notable Eph performances, including the 1500 meters sweep by Sara St. Antoine '88, Anne Knott '88 and Jen Morris '89, all of whom qualified for the East Coast Athletic Conference Championships. Also qualifying for the ECAC's were Sarah Hams '89 with a 10:54 for third in the 3000 meters, and Sarah Pierce '88 and Kate Pugh '87 in the 5000 meters. Pierce's second place time of 18:30.8 set an Eph indoor record. Other top efforts included victories by Dawn Macauley '89 in the 50 meter hurdles and the 400 meters, Susan Northen '89 in the triple jump, and the Becky Conklin '87-led mile relay team.

The male half of the track squad joined hands with Amherst and Wesleyan to compete against the Bowdoin-Bates-Colby team, but the northern foes took advantage of Little Three injuries to win 73-63.

Bates runner John Fitzgerald highlighted the meet in blazing through the 5000 meters in 15:03 to win by over a minute. Little Three bright spots included the 1500 and 3000 meters. In the 1500, Ephs Gil McCabe '89 (4:06), Ted Arrowsmith '88 (4:08) and Jon Fisher '87 (4:12) swept the top spots. The 3000 saw Dave Grossman '87 and Mark Gilrain take first and third.

Coach Richard Farley said, "We had some injuries and some people running events they weren't used to and that made the difference."

Speed was the key for Lars Hem '90 in weekend action in the Little Three loss to the Bowdoin-Bates-Colby squad. (Wege)

Students protest CIA's discrimination in hiring

by F. Craig Gangi

The Williams Bisexual, Gay, and Lesbian Union, expressing its concern over the CIA's hiring policy, and the college administration's allowing the organization to recruit on the campus, staged a demonstration last Tuesday.

The demonstration took place at the Office of Career Counseling (OCC), where the government agency was conducting interviews of prospective employees.

In a letter to the Williams community on Monday, the BGLU restated the College's charter which disallows discrimination toward those with differing sexual orientation and said, "The CIA openly discriminates on this (sexual orientation) basis and recruits students at Williams."

WBSU points to racial tension

by Karen Costenbader

The administration reacted with surprise to charges of racial tension and discrimination in a letter by the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) addressed to President Francis Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix.

The letter was presented to Fix on the morning of February 12 and printed in the Record last Tuesday, February 17. Students received the letter last Wednesday in their mailboxes.

"We, the Williams Black Student Union, are enraged over the increasing racial tension in this community," began the letter. It was co-authored by a committee of 12 WBSU members.

The letter pointed to seven particular examples of the problems which minority students have at Williams.

These included "patronizing student-teacher relationships", "administrators who listen sympathetically but refuse to take the leadership necessary", and "an academic curriculum that perpetuates ignorance and white supremacy".

The letter enumerated five immediate demands of the WBSU to be addressed by the administration: an audience with Oakley and Fix, a grievance committee, an educational program on racism, an educational program during freshman days, increased campus lighting and security.

The letter was spurred in part by a fight which took place on February 11. Initially, it was rumored that the fight between a black student and a white student had been racially motivated. However, the implications that racial intolerance led to the fight were later discredited.

The WBSU held an emergency session in the evening of February 11 at Rice House, the WBSU house. After the emergency meeting, which was attended by approximately 50 WBSU members, the committee of twelve drafted the two-page letter to be presented to Oakley and Fix.

"Some of the things in the letter were surprising," Fix said. "One of the things that I would stress to any student is that, if at any point they feel that they have not been treated properly, they should tell someone about it. Tell me, another dean, or a department chairperson."

Martin White '87, one of the five coordinators of the WBSU, and a co-author of the letter, said that the reported fight, "freed up people to talk about the gripes that they have with the institution." He continued, "It was a catalyst which made a lot of black students want to talk about their own experiences."

"Individual black students should not be held accountable for the details of the letter," said White, "because not every black student has the same experience at Williams.

"The letter was written by a group of students, and so reflects, in its general criticism, many individuals' experiences," White said. "There is no general, single, monolithic black experience that any one person can validate or invalidate."

The WBSU met with Oakley and Fix in a closed session at Rice House last Wednesday.

On Friday Oakley issued a statement to the Williams community in which he reported, "We had a constructive discussion of substantive issues concerning the well-being of our entire community."

"That racial tensions persist on campus is beyond dispute," he said. "The responsibility for finding new ways of addressing them cannot rest with any one segment of the community alone."

Cassandra Kirk '89, one of the coordinators of the WBSU, said of the meeting, "I thought it was pretty positive, but I don't know if anything is

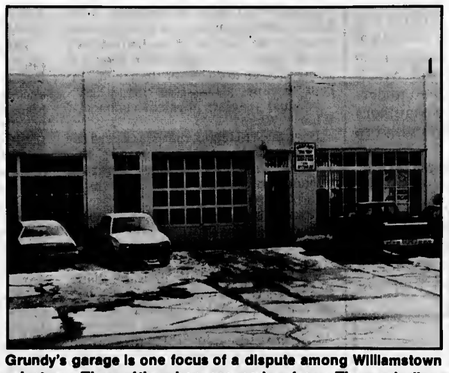
Jorling accused of conflict of interest

by Peter Balaban

Environmental studies professor and Williamstown Selectman Thomas Jorling has been accused by other selectmen of a conflict of interest with the college in an on-going debate over the location of the Williamstown municipal garage.

Jorling would like the town to purchase Grundy's garage, which is owned by the college, for refurbishment as the town garage. He is pitted against Selectmen Henry Bratcher, Alan George and J. O'Brien Locke, who want to rebuild or refurbish the old public works garage on Water Street.



Last June, the Board of Selectmen voted 3-2 to conduct a feasibility study of the old site instead of purchasing a new site. Jorling and Selectman Anita Barker voted against the measure.

On Friday, Bratcher stuck to charges he made against Jorling at a meeting of the Board of Selectmen two weeks ago. Bratcher said that Jorling is acting in a conflict of interest and acting as an agent of his employer, Williams College.

"Grundy's would be an unsuitable and expensive alternative for Williamstown," he said.

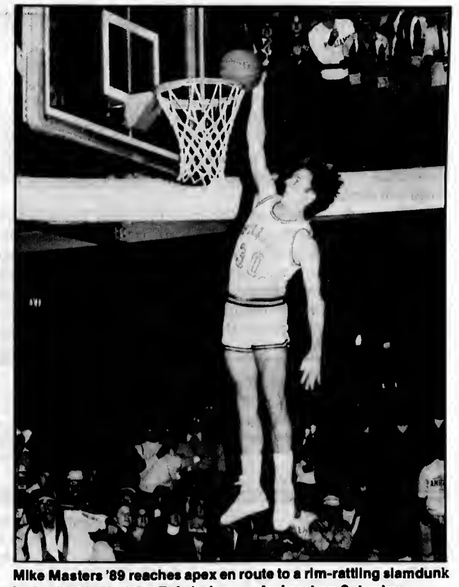
According to the Advocate, Bratcher said at the Board meeting two weeks ago that Jorling is trying to sell the town an old building it does not need so the college can buy the present site, which directly abuts college land.

Williams purchased Grundy's garage, at 26 Water Street, last December. Jorling and college officials have said that the college intends to use Grundy's as a storage facility.

Grundy's garage is one focus of a dispute among Williamstown selectmen. Three of them have accused professor Thomas Jorling, also a selectman, of suggesting the building serve as the new municipal garage so that the existing garage site will become available for purchase by Williams. (Somers)

At last week's Board meeting, George said that Jorling mentioned he wanted the Selectmen to consider Grundy's before the ink on the purchase agreement for Grundy's had dried.

College Treasurer William Reed said "we've expressed an interest in that land (the old garage site), particularly for a parking lot, because it is adjacent to the college. If the town wants to sell it, we'd be interested in bidding on it."



Reed said if the town was willing to sell the land, the college might consider developing it for commercial use or using it to link Spring and Water streets by combining it with the plaza/walkway under construction near the new gymnasium complex.

Reed said the charges against Jorling are "very unfortunate and degrading to both him and the college." He said Jorling was clearly acting only in his role as selectman.

Barker said last week that the charges against Jorling were unfounded and that "his reputation speaks for itself." "The college would like to keep Grundy's," she added, and Jorling is acting against the interests of the college in his bid to acquire it.

Jorling circulated a petition last month and was able to obtain the necessary 100 signatures to include his proposal for the purchase of Grundy's on the College basketball at its best. That's what the capacity crowd at Lasell Gymnasium witnessed Saturday night as the Williams men's basketball team staved off the Amherst Jeffs 73-68.

The win not only avenged the earlier loss to Amherst, but made the Ephs (13-6) prime contenders for an East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC) playoff spot.

The key play of the contest came with 1:11 left, with the Ephmen holding a 68-67 lead. After Bill Melchionni '89 made a diving save of an errant pass, captain center Greg Lang '87 made a desperation drive through the lane as the shot

Be more specific

Many students found the letter circulated last week by the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) to be very disturbing. But a sense of urgency and a willingness to disturb were probably appropriate qualities for such a letter to have.

The letter said that WBSU members are enraged over increasing racial tension in the college community. Any students reading the letter who were convinced that racial insensitivity, much less overt racism, doesn't exist on this campus deserved to be shocked out of the haze they were in.

The letter is carefully worded. Its accusations are relatively specific, not sweeping. It does not accuse all white students of racism; it does point to "the increasing lack of racial tolerance in the white student population."

It is the very exactness of the statement which makes another aspect of it so unfortunate: the letter does not contain the evidence needed to support some of its assertions.

For example, it cites "patronizing student-teacher relationships" in seven academic departments, but then gives no details.

The statement maintains that the college's Office of Affirmative Action is based on inaction. What should be inferred from this, other than that Nancy McIntire comes to Hopkins Hall each day only to make paper airplanes or stare out the window? The letter doesn't say which activities are not being accomplished.

If the affirmative action office is doing less than it could, or doing nothing, there are a lot of students who would like to object and apply some pressure. They can't apply pressure without facts.

The letter is also unspecific in mentioning the harassment of black students by employees of the college, and, in more general terms, on the inadequacy of the Junior Adviser and freshmen entry systems.

Several of the 12 coauthors of the letter told the Record, for an article in this issue, that the writing of the letter was sparked by reports of a racially motivated fight on campus. After the letter was sent to Dean of the College Stephen Fix, it was learned that race did not have much to do with the fight, a fact which both the administration and the WBSU members agree on. The initial report of racial violence was an understandable catalyst for the outcry made in the letter. It led the coauthors to combine their reactions to personal experiences of racism and to formulate demands.

The demands are generally reasonable ones. The grievance committee outlined in one of the demands would be an organization designed to obtain and disseminate the type of evidence discussed here.

The WBSU's assertions were made without evidence, but that does not necessarily they were incorrect or unwarranted. All members of the community, not just the members of the WBSU, should now try to find substantiating evidence for these charges — and once they find that evidence, renew their efforts to expel racism from Williams.

Letters

Astonished

To the Editor:

I, a fairly average Williams student, am astonished at the foolish and absurd nature of the Black Student Union's February 17 letter. The BSU "points" at just about everything and everyone in sight, but they don't show us anything. If the BSU wants to convince me that the racial situation on campus is as bad as they would have us believe, then they are going to have to do better than their current "because we say it is" mentality.

"Actual (racial) physical violence"? Where? When?

Does the BSU think that blacks are the only students that feel patronized?

Is the freshman days program intended to address black concerns in American society?

How exactly does the freshman entry system deny that blacks exist? Would segregated housing adequately observe blacks' existence?

The BSU is making fools of themselves. There is no need to act like Beirut terrorists and make "immediate" and "forthcoming demands."

A compulsory educational program on racism? Get serious!

Finally, if the BSU wants to see President Oakley and Dean Fix, then why don't they make an appointment? Whites aren't allowed in Rice House anyway.

Joshua Balint '89

Offensive

To the Editor:

I find the letter from the BSU, published in last week's edition of the Record and distributed through campus mailings, to be irresponsible and offensive. The strong complaints voiced in the letter attack large groups of the Williams community, but are unaccompanied by empirical justification.

The letter accuses our faculty, employees, and administrators of overt racism. Even if this accusation is potentially justifiable, it requires supporting evidence for verification; the BSU has an obligation, as does any organization, to clearly justify its complaints with concrete facts.

The BSU should recognize that a more specific critique, in addition to fulfilling the requirement for responsible criticism, would further its own best interests. If particular incidents of harassment by college employees can be enumerated, or if the nature of "patronizing student-teacher relationships" in specific departments can be elucidated, constructive remedial action can be taken. A broad cry of "harassment," however, can lead to no effective solution.

The problem of effective solution leads me to consider the equally unsatisfactory formulation of the demands which accompany the BSU's complaint. The placement of their aims under the heading "immediate demands" imbues the BSU's letter with an offensively threatening tone. This tone is reinforced by the promise of "forthcoming demands." The presence of such forthcoming demands also suggests that the BSU has not carefully considered its position; if the BSU is already aware of forthcoming demands, why could it not publish them with the others? Finally, I object to the hypocrisy of the first demand; after criticizing Williams for being "inconsistent with its policies," the BSU proceeds to demand the immediate presence of two white men, President Oakley and Dean Fix, in Rice House, a building to which BSU members are not permitted to invite non-black friends.

The other demands are more constructive, and evidence a more serious attempt to conquer racism at Williams. The establishment of educational programs and a grievance committee to address racial intolerance could be beneficial. However, I still object to the language of the letter, which demands "full participation by faculty, staff, students, and administrators." The BSU does not have the right to make such an educational program mandatory; I wonder if the BSU plans to label those who choose not to participate as racist.

The BSU obviously feels that there are serious problems of racial intolerance at Williams. I do not deny the validity of portions of their argument. I do, however, ask that the BSU refrain from publishing sweeping criticism without accompanying evidence. I would also suggest that demands contain specific constructive measures designed to remedy clearly defined problems. I hope that members of the BSU would require the same of other organizations.

The limits of a landfill: why Williamstown must recycle

by Andrew Mayer

Recently most of you have probably noticed the "newspaper recycling stations" on campus and have been told to deposit your newspapers there under penalty of not having your trash picked up. Behind these newspaper stands is a conservation plan implemented by the college to comply with a new town ordinance aimed at extending the life of the Williamstown landfill.

According to a recent report by the Williamstown Town Engineer, the landfill may have only five years of life left. Nan Jenks-Jay, assistant director of the Center for Environmental Studies (CES), says the life of the landfill depends on us, meaning what we do and don't put in the landfill.

In order to lengthen the life of the landfill, the Williamstown Board of Selectmen, acting on a recommendation from the Williamstown Conservation Commission, decided late last year to strictly enforce an old law prohibiting newspaper from being dumped in the landfill. They imposed a $20 fine (now $25) on each load found to include newspaper.

When the college's two haulers began to deliver to the landfill after the fine was imposed, they passed their fines back to the college. As a solution to the imposed fines, such newspaper stands have been put in most campus buildings and students and faculty are now required to separate newspapers and magazines from the rest of the trash.

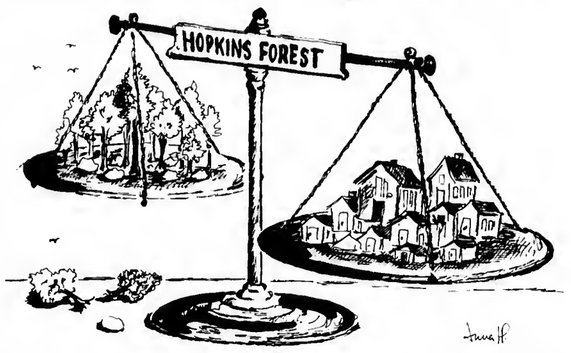
As yet there is no law against depositing white paper in the landfill, but students and faculty are urged to separate their white paper from other trash and designate it for recycling.

Jenks-Jay praised the quick actions of the college, which she noted was the easily the largest carrier of newspaper to the landfill. She called special attention to President Francis Oakely and Dean of the College Stephen Fix, who have helped in getting the college recycling plans off the ground.

Last summer Sarah Thurber '86 used a grant from the college to travel around rural New England and study various recycling plans. Last semester she remained on campus, funded by the CES and the President's Discretionary Fund, and hired Martha Hoopes '87 and Amanda Graham '89 to help her implement the plan.

In the fall Hoopes and Graham began the program by enlisting various offices on campus to voluntarily separate their white paper, computer paper, and newspapers for pick-up. Hoopes and Graham continue to pick up the white paper and the computer paper now.

In addition to the newspaper recycling stands, sheds for the storage of newspapers before they are sent to the recycling plants have been set up near Greylock, Baxter, Driscoll and Mission Park Dining Halls and in the garage of the CES.



Jenks-Jay could not praise enough the efforts of all involved in the newspaper recycling drive. She was especially excited by the "newspaper recycling stations," which she described as "middle-of-the-road," meaning they appeal to everybody.

Hoopes called attention to Bob Smith, who hauls the trash for Williams and also picks up the newspapers and takes them to the storage shed at the landfill. She also praised a Mr. Alper of the North Adams Junk Yard, who voluntarily takes the newspapers from the sheds outside CES and at the landfill to the recycling plant. Hoopes estimated that Alper is over 75 years old.

Jenks-Jay pointed out that the actions by the Board of Selectmen and by the college are a few years ahead of most other towns. She said that this move may prevent, at least for a while, having to search for a new method of disposing of trash, for which many other New England towns are now looking. She said that, all things considered, recycling wood-pulp products may be cheaper than growing the lumber and converting it into wood-pulp products.

The efforts of the Williamstown Board of Selectmen, the CES, Martha Hoopes, Amanda Graham, Sarah Thurber and others have made us aware of the growing problem of the lack of space to deposit trash and taught us how we can help out. If you feel strongly about this, contact them. They could use your help.

What price development?: building in Hopkins Forest

by Chris Finch '87

To "assume" that the "development of six houses (in Hopkins Forest) is a foregone conclusion" (Record, Feb. 17) is to make it just that and pass over the many questions raised by the plan itself. "Plan" does not necessarily imply "foregone."

First of all, the issue seems to come down to a question of the urgency of the current faculty housing problem. Certainly good faculty housing is essential to the college: faculty should be entitled to affordable housing, and housing availability can prove a critical factor in attracting new faculty to the college. Certainly the recent sale of the last faculty lot on the college's Forest Road development has signalled the beginning of a faculty housing crunch, as limited development space and the accompanying escalation in real estate values have put much Williamstown property (including former college-financed faculty homes) out of the reach of junior faculty.

On the other hand, is the situation so critical as to warrant the sudden decision to develop the six two-and-a-half acre plots in the Forest? The college has announced plans to develop 200 acres on Pine Cobble for faculty housing, an action that will, according to College Treasurer Will Reed, "solve our problems in the long run." Various sources estimate that the Pine Cobble site will be ready for development between one and two years after the Forest sites. Whether the housing problem is so overwhelming as to warrant immediate encroachment on the Forest seems at least to warrant further and more widespread discussion.

The Forest is a resource used by many in the Williams community, unlike tracts of land such as the proposed Pine Cobble development: it provides recreation to both college and townspeople, an excellent setting for scientific research, and preserves open space in a more or less natural state. CEP proposal threatens the academic vitality of college

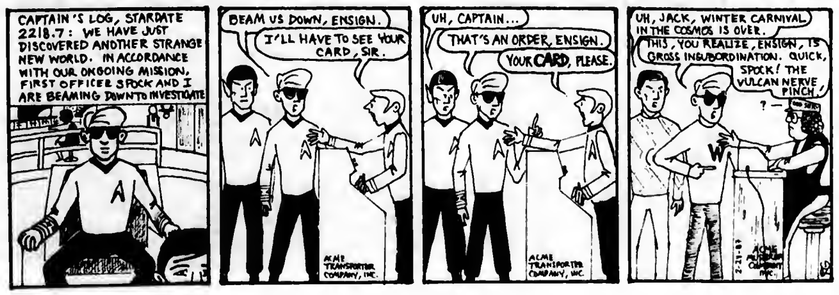
by Chuck Goodwin '87

An honest student can only react to the curriculum reform proposals of the CEP with sore disappointment. These proposals serve only to further eviscerate the freedom of inquiry that is characteristic of the liberal arts, to squander the time and efforts of the faculty, and to direct students toward long—neglected departments which now suffer underenrollment. These proposals offer nothing which will enhance the challenge and enchantment of the Williams College education.

The notion that the average Williams student has not enjoyed a well-balanced education is wrong-headed. Without planning or intent, the student does indeed study many fields and learn something about the world in which he



If anyone han't noticed, plenty of students have taken courses in foreign cultures merely because it looked like it would be fun or interesting. How many people who are now history majors have a strong science background because they happened to entertain premed contemplations during freshman year? In addition, most students will undertake certain fields simply because they feel that they are ignorant if they are unaware of its barest elements. Contrary to popular opinion, the average Williams student is not looking for the easiest way to get from Walt Whitman High to Wall St. The Williams student is usually an unusually hard worker who keeps late hours and tremendously enjoys the work he does — though chances are he would not want anyone to know about it.

All requirements must, in the final analysis, be based upon what the student should know. Naturally, the members of each department believe that what they have to offer is something of which everyone should know a little. These are dedicated people who have spent years just learning the fundamentals of what they do. They would not be where they are if they did not believe that what they did was fascinating and important. No one else is as intimately familiar with the plans he has for his life and in what he wishes to be vaguely competent.

This College's faculty are its greatest resource. The current proposal for additional academic requirements squanders this resource. When students are forced to enroll in departments and subjects for which they have little taste, the

Only 6 women get into co-ops

by Paul Kwon

Fifty-three men and six women were accepted into co-operative houses for next year, according to Linda Brown of the Housing office.

Among 193 applicants, 123 were men and 70 were women. The selection process, described by Brown as "completely random" was changed this year by the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL).

Last year each applying group was given equal representation, regardless of its size. This year, each applicant was given a random number. The lowest number in each group became the group's number.

The groups with the lowest numbers were then accepted. Thus, a larger group would have a better chance to be accepted. Statistically, accepted groups had a higher average number of students in each group than the rejected groups.

According to CUL Chairman William Wagner, "The CUL thought, in a nutshell, that last year's system favored small groups and led to disunited houses that wouldn't promote co-operative living. By shifting the weighting towards larger groups, better co-operative living would be promoted."

Brown maintained that large groups did not have an advantage, saying, "It all depends on the numbers."

According to one woman who failed to get into a co-op, the fact that larger groups had a better chance was not expressed. "Had I known that larger groups had a better chance, I could have easily gotten other friends into my group," she said.

Wagner said the new system was explained at a meeting for applicants with Assistant Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta. "Those who didn't know (that large groups had a better chance) must have missed the meeting," he said.

"It's sheer coincidence that men applied in larger groups than women did," Brown said.

The major source of controversy was that only six women were accepted. Said Brown, "It's unusual, but a fewer number of women applied. Whether it poses a balance problem remains to be seen. That's the way the system worked out. It was fair. Two or three years ago, the co-ops were mostly female. This year, it turned around."

Protestors of the uneven male-female ratio said they are circulating a petition and are planning to meet with Kenyatta, who was involved in the selecting process.

Asked if the lottery should be redone, Brown said, "How could it have been any fairer?"

Joe Esherick '88, who will be living in the all-male Lambert House co-op, said, "People may start thinking of us as a frat. But it's pretty fair. It's all luck anyway.

Theresa Lee '88, one of two women who got accepted into the Milham co-op, said she does not think that the extreme male to female ratio will hurt. "No, I don't think it (the small number of women) will pose a problem. Everybody seems happy, and I don't think you need a balance of males and females. It's not the number of women and men that counts, but how the house members will live with each other that matters."

"The male-female ratio proves that the selection was really random since they didn't attempt to change the selections after they found out the results," she said.

The six co-op houses are Goodrich, Lambert, Dewey, Susan Hopkins, Milham, and Doughty. Milham will have two women and Dewey will have four women next year; the other four houses will be all male.

Goodrich House is one co-op that will be all-male next year.

Driscoll vandalized — 4th time this year

by Debbie Snyder

Driscoll dining hall was broken into Saturday between 12:00 and 2:00 a.m., manager Rob Parkinson-Shutt said.

Parkinson-Shutt estimated that between 200 and 300 dollars worth of damages were incurred in what was the fourth break-in at Driscoll since October, 1986, and the second in two weeks.

He said that this incident differed from the first three in that it seemed deliberately destructive. Locks had been installed on the dining hall windows the week before, and Parkinson-Shutt said, "This was an actual breaking and entering."

A Food Service worker found the damage when he arrived Saturday morning to prepare for the Winter Carnival buffet. He notified James Hodgkins, director of food service, and Ransom Jenks, director of security, Parkinson-Shutt said.

No suspects have been apprehended yet, Parkinson-Shutt said, adding that further steps will be taken. He said that he suspects the vandals were students. "It seems pretty likely that it's someone who had too much alcohol last night and wanted some ice cream," he said.

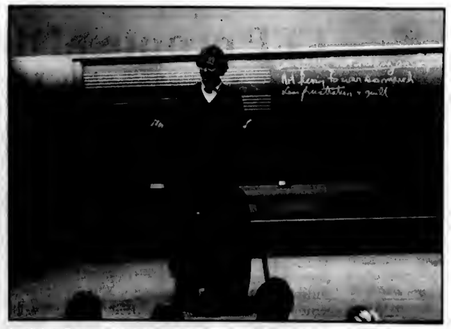
"We really go to extra efforts here," Parkinson-Shutt said. "We make an effort to know everyone who eats here."

He said that Driscoll employees were hurt by the incident because they know many of the students who eat there, and they work to make Driscoll seem less like an institutional dining hall.

A sign posted on the door to Driscoll on Saturday morning read, "We try to care about all of you, but now — we begin to wonder why! Why care if you don't? We hate to blame everyone — but we hate — and are hurt by what's happening more!"

Lakey talks on US imperialism

by Jocelyn Shadforth



The United States must recognize the existence of the American empire and take steps to dissolve it, peace and social change activist George Lakey said in a lecture last Tuesday.

The Non-violence and Social Change committee sponsored the lecture entitled "Off Their Backs And On Our Own Two Feet".

Lakey defined empire as "a situation where one nation receives a disproportionate amount of benefit while the other country at best holds steady."

Lakey referred to theorist Johann Galton and said, "Imperialism is not simply a product of capitalism. It is a characteristic of any dominance relationship. It can exist whatever the economic system is."

He cited benefits of dismantling the American empire, including environmental payoffs, less involvement in wars and defense spending, fewer dependent states and the end of an exploitative mindset.

Activist George Lakey spoke Thursday on the problems with the United States' imperialistic policies. (Ward)

Lakey pointed to the increased ability for government to meet the economic and political needs of citizens which it would have if it did not have to maintain an empire.

According to Lakey, some of CUL discusses security, house mediating system

by Susanne Abell

New measures to be taken by college Security to increase student safety on campus were discussed by the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) in its meeting last Tuesday.

Professor William Wagner, chairman of the CUL, said that the security office has written a report about recent incidents that suggest a need for improved security on campus.

He said that the security office is planning to install new lighting, emergency telephones and new locking systems for doors.

Locked buildings

Security is considering installing a system in which the main doors of dorms and buildings in which students study late at night would lock automatically at a certain hour and could be opened with student identification cards, according to Wagner.

He said that the issue of locking doors is quite controversial among the student body.

The committee discussed students' attitudes toward security and said that many locks have been broken, especially in Mission Park. Wagner said that it was rumored that students break the locks so that they will not have to bother locking their doors.

Mediator system

The committee discussed a draft of a memo from Wagner to Dean Fix entitled, "Proposals Concerning the Means to Resolve Disputes within Residential Houses."

The memo proposed the creation of a group of five mediators who would serve for one year. In the case of a dispute within a house, at least two mediators would be assigned to the case.

Although it is expected that most disputes will be resolved within the house "by the students directly involved, the house president, or a general meeting of house members,", the mediators would be consulted before the deans.

This plan would be especially beneficial for students who hesitate to contact the deans for fear of social disapprobation.

"Create a buffer"

Wagner said, "Essentially what we want to do is create a buffer between the houses and the deans' office."

Mediators' responsibilities would also involve leading discussions at each house at the beginning of the year about "the rights, responsibilities and obligations of house members," according to the memo.

The third issue was a CUL report on co-ops. This report was the result of an investigation made by a subcommittee of CUL on the system of co-op housing at Williams.

Wagner said the deans fear that informal fraternities are being formed. The report recommended that "groups be checked for discipline problems before applications are accepted."

College Council hears MASSPIRG plans

by Lisa Nahf

At Thursday's College Council meeting, Michael Caljouw '88, representing the Williams chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG), told the council about four projects MASSPIRG will be focusing on this semester.

Caljouw spoke of involving the campus in "nation-wide and state-wide interests." In a campaign to clean up hazardous waste dumps he specified sites in Pittsfield, North Adams, Adams, and a possible site in Williamstown.

Caljouw delineated MASSPIRG's current effort to educate students about nuclear power, and its present lobby against the Seabrook, N. H., plant.

Other projects are a campaign to eliminate the use of toxic art supplies in pre-schools and elementary schools, and a State House watch to follow and inform others of the actions and positions of state representatives.

In other business, Anne Shulman '88, spokesperson for a council committee studying campus safety, outlined preliminary suggestions for improving campus security.

The ideas included improving campus lighting, installing emergency phones in college buildings, replacing ineffective dorm room locks, and hiring additional security personnel and/or paid escorts.

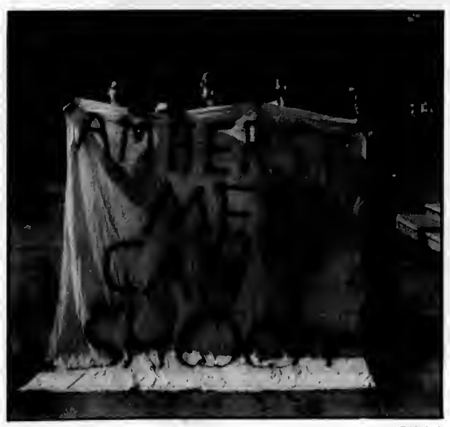
Carnival in the Cosmos



Winter Carnival '87, the "Carnival in the Cosmos," proved a hectic weekend for campus cosmonauts. Weekend activities included the traditional trike race around the freshman quad, the erotic banana-eating contest and obstacle course at Cole Field, the snow-sculpture competition and a triumphant basketball victory over Slamherst.

Party policy hurts campus bands

by Chuck Samuelson

Winter Carnival was one long party, but did anyone ever stop to think about the people who made the party go? For the DJ's and musicians who supplied the music that let Williams students get down, Winter Carnival provided an opportunity to perform and get paid — a situation that is becoming an anomaly in light of the transitional party policies that went into effect in November.

Ever since college party policy prohibited organizations from charging admission to parties, bands have been playing for smaller parties and getting paid less money.

Regulations

Chris Gascon '88, a member of the Rhythm Method, said that since the regulations went into effect there has been "a preponderance of smaller gatherings."

Don Scott, a freshman DJ, also blames the school policy banning admission charges for the differences between this year and last. "I'm sure that if the policy wasn't there, there'd be a lot more opportunity for bands to get jobs." Scott noticed the change right after the school announced the new policy. "It seemed that there wasn't much money to be spent on campus on entertainers ...(whereas during) the first five or six weeks (of school) there were tons of parties with live entertainment."

Gascon attributes the change to houses' inability to charge for parties. He said that with the exception of big subsidized

The ins and arounds of gatekeeping

by Beth Broadrup

Standing perilously on the sun-reflecting, snowy slope under five layers of clothing (at last count) and gripping a pencil in mittened fingers, I was approached several times this morning by tall, curly-haired figures with eye guards who asked, "Are you a gatekeeper?" Each time I had to suppress my urge to answer, "Why? Are you a keymaster?" Such is the mindset of a novice gatekeeper.

While the rest of the cosmos slept this morning, my comrades in gatekeeping and I were transported to Mt. Brodie by 8:00 a.m. Just why did I, who have rarely seen the light of (Satur)day before 11:00, leave bed for a morning of staring at ski tracks and straightening bent poles? Maybe a sense of duty: the ski team needed me, the ski patrol needed me, and my school needed me. And I needed P.E. credit.

Vantage point

So there I was, a vital link in the gatekeeping chain. My territory: gates 48 and 49, just above the finish line. The morning sun was at my back (there

Andy Fortune and Tim Jafek have baptized this revolutionary concept as "Supertray." Although the inventors admit that the four prototype Supertrays do not have optimal weight distribution, they stressed that the chairs make for a more enjoyable ride and they are planning to add another tray to reduce drag while maintaining comfort. "I hope that the Supertrays will be used in Olympic competition by 1996," said Jafek.

Bowdoin

WBOR is awaiting the arrival of a new antenna that was expected to arrive during Christmas break but was delayed when a transposition of numbers in the paperwork caused the antenna to be calibrated to a commercial frequency instead of Bowdoin's special educational frequency. The old antenna, sold to Sacred Heart University, was antiquated and inadequately transmitted the horizontal signal to car radios and portable radios. The new circular antenna will allow WBOR to broadcast over both horizontal and vertical waves.

University of Massachusetts

Assistant District Attorney James Larkin was assigned to investigate an Oct. 27 brawl in which 10 black and white students were injured. A report by a member of the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination found that the fight was racially motivated, pitting black New York Mets fans against white Boston Red Sox fans after New York's World Series win over Boston. Larkin hoped that the involvement of outside investigators will prompt eyewitnesses to take a more active role in the case, which will examine alleged violation of civil rights statutes and may recommend that criminal charges be brought against the instigators of the brawl. Tufts

Tufts student Ian Kremer, a white sophomore, is sporting a sling and bandage after writing that "Hate is alive and well at Tufts" in a campus newspaper column on racism and sexism. Kremer told police that he was chased by three or four white youths and beaten as they called him "nigger lover, Jew boy and pinko." The attack was followed by a spontaneous "solidarity march" by black and white students and the next day 100 students held hands in silence and sang "We Shall Overcome" near where the attack took place. Police believe the youths are enrolled at Tufts, although Kremer could not identify his attackers. "I was very upset, but I wasn't surprised, unfortunately," said Holly Heard, a black sophomore from Chicago. "I knew racism was here on campus." (North Adams Transcript)

R.P.I.

The Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute Polytechnic reported that Illinois has become the fourth state in the U.S. (joining Florida, Missouri, and Ohio) to require that foreign-born teaching assistants be required to pass English proficiency tests. Democratic Representative Barbara Pringle introduced the Ohio measure after her daughter complained that she could not understand certain foreign-born teachers at Ohio State and Kent State Universities. American graduate programs, especially those in scientific disciplines, have seen an influx of foreign students because a vast number of native students skip graduate school and go directly into the job market. Universities and faculty generally oppose the bill, saying that the situation should be handled on a case-by-case basis. Governor James Thompson of Illinois says that the bill is "cultural elitism" and "isolationism." Kirk Hard of the University of Illinois' governmental relations office pointed out that "James Madison couldn't have lectured in Illinois because he had a speech impediment."

opment of 25 acres would not destroy these uses for the other areas of the Forest, it would have a significant impact. Development in the proposed site would be visible from the most heavily used part of the Forest, the grounds around the Rosenburg Center (the farm museum), and would undermine the rural feel of this area. Furthermore, the site of the planned development is a wetland, supporting one of the richest and most biologically diverse communities in the Forest. The area is an important fawning ground for deer as well as a rich bird habitat, including nesting for barred owls and pileated woodpeckers. While Mr. Reed notes that the area is "a little used portion of the forest," and is "not key land for experimental research," it could nevertheless provide valuable research opportunities in the future. As noted above, it would adversely affect the most heavily used area of the Forest. Is the permanent loss of open land and isolation worth the temporary alleviation in housing pressure?

Beyond this lies the question of whether the planned development in the Forest will indeed significantly ease the faculty housing problem. Who in fact will get the lots? Would they be the junior faculty members for whom housing seems to represent such a problem? Is the proposed site, in one of the most expensive neighborhoods in Williamstown, the best site to provide housing. According to the Williamstown tax assessor, land values in this area are among the highest in Williamstown, and estimated property taxes on a two-and-a-half acre plot , with a nice but modest house, would be over $4000.

Furthermore, it is not clear that the problem of holding faculty housing within the college will necessarily be averted. According to Reed, the college has worked out a scheme for keeping the land in each plot under college control, while houses would be fully owned by the faculty members. It would be required that the house and property go to other faculty if an owner decided to sell. Although the next faculty owner would not have to directly pay for the land itself, it seems unlikely that a junior faculty member would be able to afford even the price of the house alone, given the real estate in Williamstown.

The college has no obligation to include students in its development or planning process, and students ordinarily have little business commenting on issues such as faculty housing. At the same time, the proposed development would directly affect students as well as faculty and other forest users. With so many questions revolving around the plan, public discussion and review would only enhance the likelihood of development that meets the needs of the college. As it stands now, the plan to develop twenty five acres of Hopkins Forest seems sudden and hard to explain, especially given the nature of the land at stake.

warrant for the upcoming town meeting on March 10.

Residents will vote to adopt Jorling's proposal (Article 3), or the Selectman's proposal (Article 1), which calls for a feasibility study of the existing public works garage site, and the appropriation of $20,000 for the study.

Jorling said last week that he has been advocating the purchase of Grundy's over the development of the current site since last March, and that the college has been calling for additional parking in the commercial district for five years.

According to the Advocate, Jorling said at the Board meeting two weeks ago that it will cost approximately 1 million dollars to renovate or rebuild the old site and $300,000 to renovate Grundy's.

Both Barker and Jorling supported a compromise measure to conduct a feasibility study of both sites. Locke, Bratcher, and George rejected the idea.

George said that a feasibility study of both sites would cost the town an additional $20,000, which would not be a cost-effective way to solve the problem.

George pointed out last week that the corner of Water Street and Main Street, where Grundy's is located, will become highly congested as town trucks come to the garage. Jorling said, "I don't see any significant change in the patterns of traffic as a result."

Anti-CEP

academic standards of those departments will be corrupted and the faculty will be allocated to teaching disinclined and intransigent students. With unwilling students swelling departments, the academic standards will have to be reduced.

In addition, it is likely that the number of "literature in translation" courses and "baby science" courses will multiply as departments attempt to deal with students who need to "meet the requirements." The time and effort of the faculty will be further wasted. A department should not have to justify itself or its budget by the number of students enrolled in its courses if that means it has to offer pandering courses.

The attempt to make Williams students more cosmopolitan by requiring them to study foreign cultures is specious. If the College wished to generate a greater level of interest in these studies, it should simply devote more resources to them by allocating new faculty and resources currently allocated to the African—Middle Eastern, Asian, and Soviet studies programs. Leaving aside Europe, both East and West, the number of faculty devoted to Africa, the Middle East, and Asia constitute less than ten percent of the faculty. One in eleven. And many of those courses — Modern China, Vietnam, Japanese — are overflowing with students. Clearly, before attempting to create any foreign cultures requirements that is not a recitation of what we all learned about the Loire in high school French class, a significant addition addition of faculty and other educational resource is needed.

What is most disturbing about the new requirements, though, is that they are not challenging to faculty or student body, not invigorating for the curriculum, and not offering a significant advancement of the liberal arts education. What we have is the addition of meddlesome academic requirements. discouraging the student imagination. At a time when Williams College could have made great changes, the CEP has put forward hack reforms and tired, emaciated proposals. This is not curriculum reform.

There are many ways in which the curriculum can be improved. President Oakley's call for a tutorial program is one which does excite the imagination. It stands in sharp contrast to the other proposals and could be a real improvement to the liberal arts education as well as a strong educational innovation. Improvements to the curriculum will arise from strong, independent thinking and from a commitment to innovation. What stands now does more harm than good.

It's eleven p.m.
Do you know where your paper is?

Yes.

Let's be real. Compare the equipment she's using to yours. If you were both trying to tunnel through a mountain, she'd have a bulldozer and you'd have a shrimp fork.

Don't despair. Your problem is already half-solved. For a limited time, you can buy an Apple® Macintosh™ Plus or a Macintosh 512K Enhanced computer with Microsoft Works—for less money.

Which is wonderful.

You get a Macintosh, with its speed, ease of use, and graphics capability. Plus, you get a software program that lets you use all this Macintosh power in all your subjects.

Microsoft Works is not just one program, it's four integrated programs: word processing, data-base management, spreadsheet with charting, and communications.

Meaning you can put charts in your history essays. Spreadsheets in your economics papers. Call Dow Jones News/Retrieval at 2:00 A.M. to get the facts for your journalism story due at 8:00 A.M.

So if you're taking more than one subject this semester, you should check out Macintosh and Microsoft Works.

But don't wait till the eleventh hour. This offer will end soon.

And your paper might stay out all night.

CIA interviewer defends his organization's hiring policies

by F. Cralg Gangi

Amidst the protest by members of the Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Union (BGLU) last week, Thomas J. Gilligan, personnel representative in New England for the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), discussed his organization's often controversial hiring policies.

He spoke of the CIA's reasons for the policy and misconceptions about it that the agency feels persist.

When asked about the CIA policy toward hiring homosexuals, Gilligan answered "The agency's public stated policy is that it does not discriminate against any group on the basis of any single factor; it examines the whole person to see whether that person can meet the security, medical, psychological and other standards."

Gilligan claimed that there are problems with hiring homosexual people in the intelligence field. "We do have difficulties in certain parts of the world assigning individuals who might have a homosexual lifestyle because in foreign countries, you're talking about not just violating local laws, but also what they consider to be religious laws."

He cited some parts of Latin America, Turkey, and parts of the Middle East as places where potential problems could arise.

Issue of freedom

"We have a problem with homosexuals and heterosexuals who cannot control their (sexual) appetites, where they will be driven by their sexual desires. It is not a patriotism issue, it is not a national security issue. Freedom is the issue," said Gilligan.

The CIA interviewer said that he thought the homosexual issue was used as a facade by people who have a general dislike for the CIA as an organization. "The issue is being used by people who are, in some respects, exploiting the homosexual issue for other political reasons," he said.

When questioned about changes in the CIA hiring policy in the future, Gilligan responded that the organization "is examining the homosexual issue and the whole issue of sexual standards in today's society, because the standards of behavior are changing."

Protest

According to the letter, the administration's policy on recruitment is that it will arrange a meeting between any organization which is thought of as practicing discrimination and a representative of the College, as well as providing an opportunity for objecting students to meet with the organization.

The BGLU questioned the College's policy: "Shouldn't the College strive for consistency between its own policies and the policies of organizations it invites to campus?"

It accused the College of facilitating the CIA's discriminatory practices.

At the demonstration, attended by approximately 25 students and faculty, John Malcolm '88, member of the BGLU and organizer of the protest, said that his organization wanted the college administration to take a stonger stance by ensuring that all organizations publicly announce before their arrival any discriminatory practices which they may use.

Malcolm said that the current policy is "merely on paper" and should be made more extreme.

Fatma Kassamali, director of the OCC, defended the right of any law-abiding organization to visit Williams, saying, "I wouldn't want to limit the student's choices by not allowing the CIA to come."

According to Kassamali, four members of the BGLU met with the CIA interviewers the night before the interviewing began. If the CIA had refused to speak to the students, they would not be allowed to conduct recruitment interviews on campus.

When asked about the demonstration, which had moved into the area by the doorway of the interview rooms, Kassamali said that it is allowed "as long as students aren't being disturbed, and those demonstrating aren't being disruptive."

When the CIA interviewed last year there were no protests. In 1985, however, students staged a citizens arrest of the interviewers, in order to protest CIA actions in Latin America.

According to Kassamali, the Army was once refused the right to interview because they would not agree to have a question-and-answer period with students.

Several days after their demonstration, members of the BGLU spoke with Dean of the College Stephen Fix and planned to meet with College president Francis Oakley to discuss ways of revising the College's policy, including making interviewing companies state publicly their hiring policies.

According to Malcolm, the goal of the BGLU is "to revise policy to make it internally consistent."

Hoops

clock wound down and drew the fifth foul on Jeff star Yrom Groff.

Lang (13 points, 13 rebounds) converted the second free throw to up the lead to two. Said coach Harry Sheehy, "If Greg isn't the unsung hero of all of New England, I don't know who is."

After Brandt Johnson '87 (10 points) snared the last of his 21 rebounds on a Jeff miss, Garcia Major '90 was fouled but clanged the free throw. Amherst cut the lead to one, and Major drew a blocking foul at 0:26.

Having missed several attempts from the line, the ice-blooded freshman drained both ends of the one-and-one to put the Ephs up 71-68. A Jeff three-pointer hit iron, and Melchionni skied for the board. The high-flying soph hit both free throws to seal the contest.

Early domination

The close finish seemed unlikely in the first half as Williams jumped out to a early lead and expanded it up to 16 before Amherst pulled back within 11. Major got a breakaway layup and a three-pointer to close the half with the Ephs leading 44-30. Mike Masters '89 spearheaded a tough man-to-man defense in holding Groff to a few garbage baskets.

The second half began with five minutes of sloppy play with Williams gaining a 19-point lead at the 14:41 mark. An Amherst timeout sparked a 21-5 run led by Groff and sub Scott Saft that cut the lead to 60-57 with 7:20 left.

Lang and Johnson worked the offensive boards for points countering the machine-like accuracy of Groff (25 points), as the gym rocked with each ebb and flow.

When asked if the win was the best of the year, Sheehy said, "It was Amherst, so you don't have to say anything." Lang called the game "the best win of my career". Johnson said the Ephs' rebounding was the difference: "Once they shot, if it missed, it was ours."

Earlier in the week, the Ephs dumped Middlebury 83-77. Henry Jones '88 erupted for 20 second-half points to expand a one-point halftime lead. Major had 21, Johnson 17, and John Ciulla '87 10. Poor Panther free throw shooting aided Williams as they completed the season sweep over Middlebury.

The victories were vital to the Ephs' playoff chances, for although Amherst captured the Little Three, Williams still has a good enough overall record to qualify for the ECAC's. A win over Wesleyan on Saturday would, according to Sheehy, put the Ephs in: "If we beat Wesleyan and don't get in, there ought to be an investigation."

Today, the squad travels to Clark to play the number-one ranked team in New England Division III. The Wesleyan game on Saturday will be the last game in Lasell Gymnasium, the oldest gym in the country playing host to varsity college basketball.

Bands

events, bands and DJ's are being forced to take less money. "We have been settling for less just because houses can't afford to put up that kind of money when they're not getting anything back."

Gascon does not think that the Rhythm Method will wind up playing any less than they did last year, but he admits that he is with an established group and even their gigs are harder to come by. "You have to work a little harder to get jobs," he said, explaining that instead of having house presidents call them, they must go out and look for work. He also said that bands and DJ's face very different opportunities than they did last year. "The scene has changed dramatically."

While no one seems to have a definite solution to the problems that entertainers face on campus, some did offer possibilities. Scott suggested the formation of a "party fund" to defray the high cost of throwing parties. Maybe "party co-ops" such as the recent party in the Greylock dining hall, which was sponsored by all of the Greylock houses, might represent a new wave of the future. Whatever the solution, it is clear that parties will be different until their costs can be met.

WBSU letter

going to get done. It helps that everyone is talking."

She described Oakley as "really shocked that all this has been happening and nothing is being done. He didn't even know anything about it."

She said that a group of students at the meeting had said that it is difficult for them to encourage prospective students to come to Williams when they are upset about the racial tension they feel.

"We heard a lot of things last night, and we learned a lot," Fix told the Record the morning after his and Oakley's meeting with the WBSU. "There were a lot of good suggestions made and we need some time to think them over."

In meeting with the WBSU, Oakley mentioned some of the plans for ameliorating racial tensions on campus that were being considered. Programs or seminars for faculty, with sessions on race and gender issues in the classroom, are tentatively scheduled for next year.

Focus groups consisting of black faculty, students and members of the Admissions Office will also be set up. In April, a distinguished black administrator is scheduled to come to Williams to speak on the issue of racial intolerance in the college setting.

Michael Bourdoni '90, one of the co-authors of the letter, said, "It was a very productive meeting. The President said the school is going to take a more active role and everyone will know what is going on." He added, "We're waiting for actions to be taken. We'll have to see."

Monique Waddell '90, also a co-author of the letter, commented, "The meeting was just a first step. That's all I can say."

"That racial tensions persist on campus is beyond dispute."
—Oakley

The WBSU's letter said, "We point to the ineffective bureaucratic Office of Affirmative Action, which is structured on the basis of inactivity." Said Devonya Havis '87, a WBSU member, "I know that one of the specific gripes that I have, and I can't speak for us all, is that it is difficult to function as an Office of Affirmative Action in an institution which has decentralized hiring practices. It just looks at what a department has already done or is in the process of doing. Put simply, it has no teeth."

The Office of Affirmative Action is directed by Assistant to the President Nancy McIntire. Said Dean of the Faculty John Reichert, "In my opinion, the claim that the Affirmative Action Office has been ineffective and inactive is grossly inaccurate and unfair."

"I know from experience how hard Ms. McIntire and her office have worked to support our affirmative action efforts, in locating minority and women candidates, in helping department chairs in the recruiting process, in helping introduce the candidates to the college, and most important, in working energetically and effectively to raise the conscience of the college in these matters," Reichert said.

Another source of tension cited by the letter was "the inadequate orientation of freshmen that begins a process of ignorance which culminates in the alienation of black students at Williams."

Havis, who was a junior advisor last year, said, "From the perspective of a minority student, or anyone different, there are problems with the whole entry system. Existing problems are exacerbated by it."

She continued, "How do you select a good JA? What is one? ... How do you equip someone to deal with difference when they have never been equipped to deal with difference before except in a very terse way."

Jim Reichheld '87, who was president of the Junior Advisors last year and is head of the JA Selection Committee this year, said, "JA orientation was fantastic when we had it my year. It addressed the problems and the necessity of dealing with true diversity. It encouraged JA's to work at enjoying meeting and living with people from many different cultures."

Reichheld said, "The problem is two-way. The JA's have to encourage freshmen to get excited about meeting people of diverse backgrounds, and the BSU has to encourage black students to meet students with backgrounds different than their own."

the negative consequences of the end of American empire would include a lower standard of living for the upper and middle classes of the dominant nation, the need to find new sources for meeting domestic requirements, the restructuring of the imperial nation's economy and the destabilization of the world order.

Lakey advocated an incremental transformation with short-term goals and groups of people working creatively. He said, "We have to put forward a positive vision of what we want instead of just tearing things down. I know I don't like change just for the sake of change."

Lakey outlined five stages for grouping activity in order to implement change for a non-imperial society: cultural preparation, organization building an altered world view, mass noncooperation, the creation of parallel institutions.

Lakey is a coordinator of the Philadelphia-based Jobs with Peace organization.

goes the futile attempt at a tan), and the wind was at my face. From my vantage point, I could see virtually the whole slope, with excellent views of the excitement of competitive skiing along with the real thrills — wipe-outs — none of which rivaled the "Wide World of Sports" opening shot.

Armed with my scorecard and pencil, I stood on the side of the run (actually, I didn't stand; I walked and stomped my feet in attempts to restore circulation to my toes) from about 8:40 until 12:40, when the women's slalom was over. Between the poles over which I had absolute authority (all four of them) passed accomplished skiers, 66 men and about 62 women, from such schools as Dartmouth, Bates, Cornell, and the University of Vermont.

"Course!"

I dutifully followed the skis of each one to make sure no fauits had occurred; no missed or straddled gate must go unnoted. And that was not all; in between writing check marks or "F"s, I performed the invaluable service of passing along the yell of "course!" to awaken (I mean, alert) other gatekeepers to the approach of another skier.

The hours passed, and the skiers passed. The skiers began to look the same, and so did the poles, although come to think of it, they always had. Between the men's and women's races, my sovereignty over gates 48 and 49 was revoked, and I was sent up the mountain to a new station with a new scorecard. I was a bit disoriented for a moment, but the glare there was pretty much the same, and I adjusted.

Boxed lunches

At last the time of deliverance arrived with skier 127 or 128 (It was a bit blurry). We skidded down the slope in boots along with some real skiers and even a few stray dogs, handed in our cards, grabbed one of those infamous boxed lunches (great brownies), and headed for the bus, which had already left. Typical. We finally made it home just as every normal student was leaving brunch. Thus ended my first (and possibly last) stint as a gatekeeper, and all I have to show for it is a sunburned nose and a mild case of chapping.

OT loss to Amherst puts hoops at 13-7

by Drew Sawyer

Two tough women's basketball teams ventured into the Purple Valley last week expecting to win. Smith arrived Tuesday and fell to the Eph netters, but Amherst managed to escape with an overtime win to claim the Little Three crown.

Carnival weekend was an exciting one for the Ephwomen, as they played the Lord Jeffs tight after having been beaten badly in January. It was a moral victory to "play well together after having been killed at Amherst," said forward Nancy Hedeman '89. Down six at the half, the Ephs fought back with big buckets from Julia Beasley '89 (14 points).

The climax of the game came with 29 seconds left with the score tied at 60. Amherst's Danielle Carver '89 was at the line shooting a one-and-one. With about fifty fans yelling and waving in Carver's face, she missed. However, the Ephs failed to score so it was into overtime. In the extra period, Jeff free throws made the difference as Amherst took the win 69-66.

The game against Smith was a close one throughout, as both teams switched between man-to-man and zone defenses, but neither squad could open a lead. While Smith controlled the boards 22-15 in the first half and executed an effective motion offense, the Williams' women hung tough, down only one at intermission.

In the second half, the lead changed hands many times until, at the 4:00 minute mark, Williams switched to a full-court man-to-man. Finally the turnovers came as Smith travelled once and threw away a pass. Joyce Rogers '88 and Missy Crouchley '89 combined for three steals leading to six points to open the Eph lead to ten. The final score was 81-69.

Balanced scoring from Crouchley (20 points), Hedeman (19) and Kim Hatch '88 (16) was a key to victory. Assists came from Beasley with 11 and Hatch with five.

Fan support, as shown in the Amherst game, can be important for the 13-7 hoopsters, and the final home game of the season is tonight versus R.P.I.

up to 13th with an "amazing" second effort. Captain Helge Weiner '87 took 21st to round out the men's placers.

On Friday's Nordic side, the individual racers brought home a sixth-place finish for the Ephmen. Pete Milliken '90 placed 21st for his best result of the year, with sophomores Bob Fisher and Grae Davis 24th and 29th respectively. The men stood in fifth place after Friday's results.

The women did even better, standing third after the first day. In the GS, Amy Duncombe '89 (9th), Mari Omland '89 (11th) and Donna MacDonald '87 (12th) led a team finish of second. Duncombe's second run moved her up from 15th to ninth in her highest place of the year. She said that she hopes that the carnival was "a turning point in my season as I am trying hard to qualify for the Nationals." The run was even more impressive as the course "did not use the hill well; it did not feed into the major changes of terrain—the turns were too abrupt," according to Monika Kopp '89. Other than Duncombe, the team had problems on the second run, especially in the lower flats.

Kathy Wolf '88 highlighted the Nordic events for the Ephs with a second place in the individual race. The time moved her up to fourth in New England. Kirsten Froburg '90 was 18th and Anne Arnason '89 was 19th as the Ephwomen were third overall behind UVM and Middlebury.

Saturday's action

Saturday was equally beautiful day for skiing. The men were led in the slalom by Seed who took an amazing second place with a time of 1:27.66. Fighting both the cold and the course, the team took fourth overall in the slalom. The course was set up late and gates were constantly flying out, causing an hour's delay in the event. In the cross-country relay, Williams placed sixth, moving the men up to fourth in the cumulative totals for the carnival, their highest place of the carnival circuit.

The downhill women fought flat light and deep ruts in capturing second place in the slalom. Omland was fourth in a time of 1:42.28 and MacDonald took fifth at 1:44.36. Said Omland, "It was the first time this year that three racers (Omland, MacDonald, and Linda Glass '89) have finished standing up throughout the entire race." The team has had problems completing previous courses, but not on Saturday.

The Nordic relay squad placed third to push the Ephs within two points of second-place Middlebury, but the team was forced to settle for third, their best finish of the year. Omland noted that it was "the best carnival for the Williams racers in the past two years."

The Ephs have one more carnival (Middlebury) before part of the team travels to Anchorage for the Nationals. Seed, Parisien, MacDonald, Omland and Wolf have already qualified and four others need high finishes at Middlebury to get bids.

Swimming

Strong efforts by the women's swimming team left Williams in second place at the New England Swimming Championships last Friday. The surprising Ephs scored well in all events, leaving them just 27 points shy of defending champion Tufts.

Distance freestylers Jen Raymond '87 and Michelle Freemer '90 led the way for Coach Carl Samuelson's team with a one-two sweep in the 500. Raymond's winning time of 5:15.47 earned her a fourth trip to the National Championship meet, while Freemer gained her first berth with her runner-up finish.

Steady Joan Horgan '87 won the 200 back in 2:12.46, and Anne MacEachern '90 added a victory in the 50 breast. Jen Campbell '87 contributed valuable points in a third-place finish in one-meter diving. Raymond, Freemer, MacEachern and Connie Davis '90 capped the first night with a win in the 800 free relay.

Entering the second and third days of the competition, the team felt that they would be competitive with Bowdoin and Amherst. Final results were not available at press time.

W. Squash

After an intense two weeks of play, the women's squash team enjoyed an easier week, handily defeating Smith 9-0 and Tufts 6-3 to raise their record to 14-8.

The Tuesday match versus Smith was the squad's final home match, and the Ephs put on a great show, sweeping all nine contests by 3-0 scores. Against Tufts, Williams had only seven healthy players and were forced to forfeit two matches. Nevertheless, the Ephwomen took six of the remaining seven matches for the win.

The easy wins sets the Ephs on target for a great showing in next week's nationals where the top four players will compete at Harvard.

— Marc McDermott

M. Track

The men's track team came away with an impressive fourth place finish at the NCAA Division III New England Regionals Saturday at Colby. Many personal records were set in a day of superlative performances.

The team was led by the first place finishes of Geoffrey Igharo '90 in the triple jump and Andre Lopez '87 in the 500 meters. Igharo set a school record winning on his first jump with a leap of 46' 11". With this mark, the freshman qualified for the Division III nationals. Lopez's accomplishment was equally stunning as he blazed to 65.7 second finish in leading the pack.

Dave Grossman '87 bettered his previous best in the 5000 meters by over 30 seconds and was awarded with a third-place finish in 14:54. Ken Alleyne '88 placed second in the long jump at 21' 4". Jon Fisher '87 was fifth with a time of 2:35 in the 1000 meters and Joe McGinn '88 was sixth in the 35 lb. weight throw, and Scott Purdy '88 ran a personal record of 8.0 to capture fourth in the 55 meter hurdles.

Qualifying for the Division I nationals for the men were Igharo in the triple jump and in the 55 meter dash as well. Lopez as well qualified, his event being the 500 meters. For the women, three runners were invited—Dawn Macauley '89 in the 400 meters, the two-mile relay team and the 4X800 relay team

by Al Mottur and Stewart Verdery

Recently, a panel discussion was held to debate the issue of whether or not intercollegiate athletics complement academics. While panelist track coach Peter Farwell '73 said that "I could not have done as well academically without athletics," political science professor Kurt Tauber countered that intercollegiate athletics should be abolished in favor of unorganized athletics.

We disagree. Intramural or individual sports cannot provide the benefits one derives from being a member of a team. Working hard, going through hardships together, learning when to lead and when to follow, and experiencing the instruction and guidance provided by a coach are but a few of the positives that being a member of a team offers.

This is not to say that intramural and individual sports do not have their merits. Indeed, just as many people participate and enjoy broomball, Sunday Night leagues, etc. as play varsity or j.v. sports. But these are more social events for the participants than the serious time committments put in by athletes involved in intercollegiate sports. Furthermore, if our varsity teams were eliminated, dispersing the players into the intramural ranks, the average person would be hard pressed to compete.

Senior John Ciolek noted at the panel that conflicts between athletics and academic duties such as labs and teaching assistant sessions create an "unnatural and pernicious dichotomy." However, all responsibilities, whether to the football team, the jazz ensemble, a job, or partying, distract to an extent from a student's possible academic effort. College is more than just a bio-lab, it is the overall experience of interacting with people in a number of settings, some of which are on the field, court or pool.

Tauber calls the occasional practice of admitting an athlete with a slightly weaker academic record "over a more academically gifted person ... a catastrophe." Williams admits people for a variety of reasons, not merely on their strict academic record. Carrying Tauber's argument a step further, great artists or musicians without awesome academic records would not recieve special treatment. The catastrophe would then be the loss of the diversity that distinguishes Williams.

In addition, intercollegiate sports provide a unifying effect on the whole Williams community. People care about our teams: anyone who was at Saturday's men's basketball game against Amherst experienced the satisfaction of beating the Jeffs. For at least two hours, people forgot about any hostilities (except towards the Amherst fans) existing on campus and came together to root the Ephs on to victory.

Sure, a few qualified students are not admitted, homework is put off, or TA sessions are missed; however, these sacrifices are minute when compared to the attributes that Williams gains from its intercollegiate sports teams.

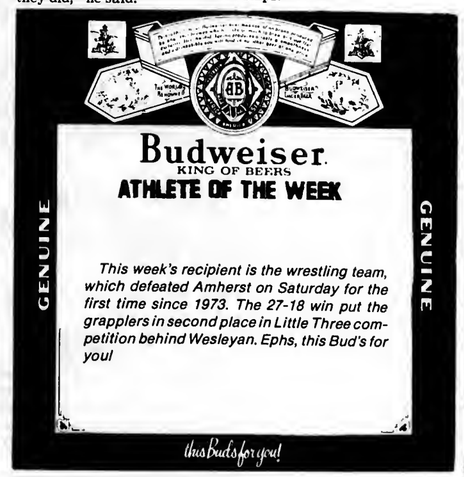
Squash gains Little Three crown

by Chuck Samuelson

On Saturday the men's squash team crushed a much weaker Wesleyan squad en route to the Little Three crown. The home match was the last team contest for the Ephs, who finished the regular season with a 15-4 record.

The match against the Cardinals might as well have been over before it began. Williams did not lose a game as it rolled to a 9-0 victory. Co-captain Matt McCall '87 and Pier Friend '88 posted the low scores of the day by giving up only ten points in their matches. The rest of the team did not have to work much harder.

The Cardinals frustration was best expressed by Franz Lembke in his losing effort against Dana Weeder '88. After losing a point in the third game, Lembke threw up his hands in despair and shouted, "Oh, goodness me!"



After the match, Coach Sean Sloane said that the win left little doubt that the team would be ranked seventh in the country when the final poll comes out. The team's hopes for a number six ranking were dashed earlier in the week when Penn, their competition for the ranking, beat highly regarded Yale 5-4.

Last Tuesday, the team trekked down to the traitorous environs of Amherst. Although the team squeaked away with a 5-4 victory, Coach Sloane said that the outcome of the match "never really was in doubt." The Jeffs played an inspired game for their long time coach, Ed Serues, who is retiring after the season, but in the end the Ephs were just too talented. Sophomores Adam Kimberly, Doug Gilbert, and Lewis Fischer all won by identical 3-0 scores, McCall won 3-2, and Rick Hedeman '87 won 3-1. All of the team's losses were by identical 3-2 margins.

The Ephs' relatively easy wins and Amherst's hard-fought victories led Sloane to say that the match was not as close as the 5-4 score might lead one to believe. "They played the best they could to get as close as they did," he said.

Last weekend, seven members of the team travelled to Philadelphia to play in the United States Squash and Racquet Association National Men's Team Championship. Williams' A team, comprised of the team's top five players, co-captain Keith Goldfeld '87, Junior Wendell Chestnut, McCall Weeder, and Fischer lost to the tourney's eventual winner, Harvard, 5-0 in the quarter-finals.

Next weekend, the Ephs' top six players will go to Yale for the intercollegiate championships.

Wrestlers pin Lord Jeffs, snap drought of 15 years

by Scott Mozarsky

When the Division III wrestling rankings came out on Monday, Williams was ranked ninth and Amherst tenth. The Ephmen verified the rankings on Saturday as they defeated the Lord Jeffs 27-18 at the Little Three Championships at Wesleyan. Also, Wesleyan first downed Amherst and then the Ephs to capture the crown, but Williams was ecstatic nonetheless, having emerged with its first victory over the hated Lord Jeffs since 1973.

The meet began well for the Ephs as Steve Felix '90 continued his brilliant season by pinning his Jeff opponent in the first period. Felix's win was followed by a tough 8-5 loss by Ed Anderson and decision wins by co-captain Andy Anselmi '87 and Jeff Steele '89. According to Anselmi, "I felt good after I won, but it was an even better feeling when Steele won. It's good to see him get one, after losing so many close matches lately."

Freshman Scott Brown followed Steele's match with a 9-1 loss to last year's New England Champion at his weight class. After Wil Lafave '90 was pinned, co-captain Dan McDonnel '87 got the Ephs rolling again with a 4-3 win. Said the senior, "It's always good to win, but to beat Amherst was extra-special."

The match was sealed by freshman Carey Simon who wrestled brilliantly in pinning his opponent in the second stanza. "This season has been a learning experience for me, but I knew that if I worked hard, and concentrated, it would all pay off," said Simon. If victory was ever in doubt, sophomore standout Mark Duff ended all speculation, as he continued to successfully gear up for the New Englands with a technical fall victory by an 18-3 score.

The win over Amherst returned the coveted Purple Pail to the Berkshires. The pail has on it the score of every Eph-Lord Jeff wrestling match since 1929 and has not been in Williams' possession for fifteen years. Having captured the pail is reward enough for the squad's most successful season in recent memory. All that remains is for Duff and the rest of his teammates to travel to the New Englands this weekend at Amherst.

Skiers capture high marks at Carnival

by Katie Albright

After months of travelling around New England for carnivals, the Williams ski teams hosted their own this past weekend at Brodie Mountain. The results were very impressive, as both the women (3rd) and the men (4th) bettered their usual carnival results, and many skiers had their best performances of the season

On Friday, with two hours of warmup runs behind them, the squads attacked the mountain's hard and fast slopes. For the alpiners, the giant slalom course brought cheers for the Williams men. Facing a course demanding precise and accurate movements at high speeds around wide turns, the men captured second behind powerhouse Vermont. Freshman sensation J.P. Parisien, in "a big surprise", according to coach Bud Fisher, grabbed second place. Classmate Lindon Seed, who fell on his first run, moved

by Al Mottur

Before a huge Winter Carnival crowd, the men's hockey team got a much needed breather as it downed an undermanned and inferior Westfield St. squad on Friday night by a 7-2 score, upping the team's record to 7-12-2. The win, which came on the heels of a tough 4-2 loss to Babson, marked the final home game for the squad's seniors, most of whom contributed heavily to the victory.

After Ron Van Belle '90 opened the scoring for the Ephs with his fourteenth goal of the year, senior winger Craig Cheevers made the most of his final home game as he converted a pretty pass from classmate and linemate Denny Wright into a goal at 9:28 of the first period. The Cheevers goal was followed a minute later by a Cheevers assist as the savvy senior sent Tim McKone '87 in alone against bewildered Owl goalie Jim Hailey. McKone converted to give the Ephs a 3-0 lead.

Cheevers' play in the first period was evidence of the smart play which is the winger's trademark. Not the fastest nor the most talented player on the squad, Cheevers posesses an innate hockey sense which befudles opponents and improves the play of his teammates, making him a more valuable asset than his stats would suggest.

As the first period wound down, sophomore Mike Swenson, who has been on a goal scoring tear lately, deposited the first of his two scores on the night, both of which were assisted by Chris Conway '89 and Will Putnam '89. The Swenson score made the lead stand at 4-0 and accentuated the Ephs' dominance as the two teams headed to the locker rooms.

Action for the remainder of the game was relatively even as Williams let up emotionally and only outscored the Owls 3-2 over the last two periods. Nonetheless the Ephs outshot their opponents by a remarkable 59 to 25 margin and never had reason to doubt victory.

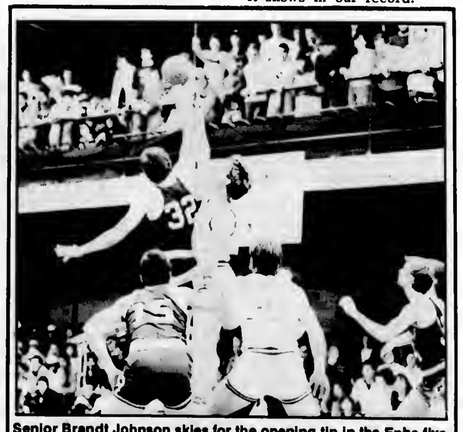
Igniting the passive crowd late in the third period was the entrance of Jon Bank into the game to mind the Eph net. Bank, a sophomore who had never seen action in a regular season game, was an instant crowd favorite as he played for five minutes and stopped three Owl shots before he let in a meaningless goal with five seconds to play.

Prior to the rout of Westfield St., the Ephs lost a tough one to Babson on Tuesday at home. The 4-2 loss was nearly an Eph win as two apparent third period goals were waved off because the goal had moved off its moorings before the puck crossed the line. Regardless, the squad played well against the fourth-ranked team in the nation, once again displaying the potential to contend with the country's best.

Tonight, the Ephs will conclude their season as they travel to Salem State in what promises to be another tough test. A Williams win would provide head coach Bill McCormick with his 300th career victory.

Icewomen finish year by defeating B.C. 1-0

by Ted Hobart



The women's hockey team finished its finest season ever on Saturday, posting a 9-6 record with a 1-0 win over Boston College in the Lansing Chapman Rink on Saturday. The shutout was the team's fifth whitewash of the season, an all-time high for the pucksters.

The B.C. contest started out in typical fashion for the Ephs as they controlled the game and outshot their opponents, but failed to cash in on valuable scoring opportunities. Tight defense, led by inspired play from senior co-captain Haley Clifford, in front of freshman goalie Sue Pitcher, kept the Eagles off the board the whole game as the Ephs kept the pressure on.

In the second period, the deadly frontline of Catherine Eaton '88, Kirsten Rooks '87 and co-captain Leslie Fernandes '87 came through as Eaton fed Rooks at center ice, who glided in from the left boards and lifted the puck into the upper corner of the net on the goalie's glove side.

Last Tuesday, the team was not so fortunate as it lost to the University of Connecticut 6-4. The game was tight in the late going until U. Conn iced an empty net goal in the final minute.

Coach Jim Briggs and the captains said they were extremely pleased with the team's performance this year. Said Clifford, "Everyone put a lot more effort in this year, and it shows in our record."

Senior Brandt Johnson skies for the opening tip in the Ephs five-point win over Amherst on Saturday. As a huge crowd watched the last Amherst-Williams game in Lasell gymnasium, Johnson dominated the inside, hauling down 21 rebounds. See page 1 for the story. (Wege)

ACSR supports 2 proxies on South Africa

by Paul Kwon

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) voted at its meeting last week to recommend that the Finance Committee of the Board of Trustees approve shareholder resolutions calling on two companies to withdraw their operations from South Africa.

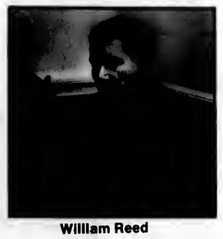
The companies are Caterpillar Tractor Co. and John Deere and Co.

College Treasurer William Reed told the Record that the committee approved the resolutions by a majority vote.

The resolutions, known as proxies, were submitted by the New York State retirement fund, which like Williams is a shareholder in both companies.

According to ACSR chairman James Wood, Caterpillar and John Deere each had a rating of two under the Sullivan Principles as of January 31. A rating of two indicates that the company is making progress in fighting racial discrimination in South Africa.

The first part of the ACSR's Thursday meeting was open to the public and consisted of a discussion of whether the committee should support the shareholder resolutions calling for withdrawal.



The committee then went into executive session to vote, and a Record reporter was asked to leave. Reed disclosed the results of the vote in a telephone interview Saturday.

The discussion at the meeting began with a description of the Deere & Co.'s efforts to help its black employees in South Africa. According to Deere's report, the company has offered legal and community aid to its black employees.

College provost Neil Grabois said this aid was not enough to warrant a stay in South Africa. "The question is what else can they do? The answer is that it doesn't matter what they do," he said.

"Even if a company were selling aspirin for one-fourth of a cent per tablet for black Africans and it was the only source of aspirin for black Africans, we'd still have to tell them to get out," Grabois said. "Otherwise, our policy is useless. It will hurt individuals, and more blacks than whites, but unless we exert all the economic pressure we can on South Africa, the policy of disinvestment advocacy is meaningless."

Reed disagreed. "Deere builds the roads that blacks ride on," he said. "Based on their report, I would vote against disinvestment in this case."

William Reed

ACSR member Judge Charles Alberti argued against disinvestment advocacy, saying "The government will never change. If the company can provide some good things there that would not be replaced if it got out, it should stay. The government will remain the same even if all the companies pulled out.

Wood closed the discussion saying, "The question is not what we can make happen in South Africa, but what are our responsibilities as shareholders. The official policy of the college is disinvestment advocacy. We don't have to follow it. The question we each have to deal with is 'are we going to encourage the companies to withdraw from South

Five try for president of CC in election next week

by John McDermott

Five pairs of juniors are running for College Council president and vice-president in next week's elections.

Party policy and racial tension are two major challenges facing the council in the next year, the candidates said in interviews with the Record. Excerpts from those interviews appear on this page. The candidates' statements are printed on pages seven and eight in a council-sponsored forum.

The candidates for president and vice-president, respectively, are Wendell Chestnut and Pavlos Yeroulanos, David Kane and Andrew Harris, Nathan Schimke and Kenneth April, and Anne Shulman and Brooke Ackerly, and Carter Zinn and Nicole Melcher.

Juniors Tim Hamilton and Mark Raisbeck are running for treasurer. Candidates for secretary of the council are sophomores Tracey Blankenship, Henry Kim and Bill Sherman.

If there is no clear majority in the races for the council officers, the top two vote-getters in each race will enter run-off elections in the week of March 16, according to council Vice President Suzanne Blemiller '87.

Voting will take place at lunch in Baxter Hall next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday; at dinner in Mission Park and Dodd dining halls on Monday; and at dinner in Greylock and Driscoll dining halls on Tuesday.

The winners begin their terms after spring break, Blemiller said.

The election will also decide who will fill student seats on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR), the Honor and Discipline Committee and the Honorary Degrees Committee.

Cassandra Kirk '89, Vipul Lakhani '88 and Sanand Raghunandana '90 are running for the two minority representative posts on the council.

The council will not meet this Thursday, but will sponsor a forum for candidates tonight at 7:30 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

Council candidates discuss issues

Record editors John McDermott and Debbie Snyder interviewed the five teams running for President and Vice-President of the College Council. Excerpts from the responses of each team to seven areas of questioning follow.

• How College Council could be more responsive to the student body

WENDELL CHESTNUT/PAVLOS YEROULANOS: "We want more people's opinions. If you don't know what everyone's opinions are, you can't really represent them."

DAVID KANE/ANDREW HARRIS: "Sometimes College Council thinks that it should be trying to save the world, which is a bad thing since College Council can't save the world. But if College Council concentrates on doing things to make our own life at Williams College better in concrete, real ways, it can do those things."

NATHAN SCHIMKE/KENNETH APRIL: "It's really a question not so much of organization but of the interest and enthusiasm of people who are on the council and the input of students who aren't, because I think that a lot of people don't really care or don't really know what's going on in the council."

ANNE SHULMAN/BROOKE ACKERLY: "That is the primary focus of our campaign. . . .We'd like to have meetings occasionally scheduled in a larger room, especially when an issue pertains to something that we feel that a large number of students will have a debated opinion about."

CARTER ZINN/NICOLE MELCHER: "We think it could be more effective on two levels. First, the actual way in which College Council meetings are run could be improved. We think a stronger leadership style at meetings would get more done in a shorter time and give more direction to the meetings. We also think that a stronger voice on campus will make the administration listen more."

• The most important issues facing the council in the next year

CHESTNUT/YEROULANOS: Divestment — "We'll try to finalize something and get an exact feeling on how far the college will go on the issue, see if they will finally divest." Racial tension — "If people feel uncomfortable, we have to admit that something has to be done about it . . .People can be made aware of something, but you can't necessarily change them." Party policy — "I think it's vital to find an organization that will undertake (funding for parties) and take full responsibility. . .Social life is in bad condition."

KANE/HARRIS: Party policy — "What we want to see is a Williams College where every Friday and Saturday night there are two parties, one a bigger Dodd House/dining hall (type) party and the second a smaller Row House/Greylock Quad/Mission house party." Exams — "There is no reason why every single class that has under 40 or 30 students in it shouldn't have a self-scheduled exam."

SCHIMKE/APRIL: Racial tension — "One way to figure out what we can do is to set up a discussion open to everyone on campus with certain people from College Council, the BSU, the administration, etc." Curricular reform — "We support the abolition of major and distribution requirements. . .The liberal arts experience is something that everyone shares here but that everyone must interpret in his or her own way." Party policy — "None of the nerd candidates drinks or goes to parties, but we don't have any objections to other people doing so."

SHULMAN/ACKERLY: Party policy — "Most of the complaints that come into College Council are about social issues and the lack of things to do which leads to extra stress and no outlet. . .What we're thinking about doing is having College Council pay for music; this would cut down on the cost of giving parties for houses, therefore encouraging more house parties, therefore relaxing the feeling at house parties so that it's not a crunch for a keg." Minority students — "We're learning more about what they're having problems with, and from there we can see what we can do, whereas before, it just wasn't talked about, or it wasn't talked about enough."

ZINN/MELCHER: Racial tension — "We're very concerned about removing the debate about racism on campus from antagonistic, antiproductive dialogue into a more structured, useful dialogue." Tenure — "We're proposing that these positions (on the CAP) be made open to all tenured professors, not just full professors. We basically feel that as though the present makeup and the present eligibility requirements for the CAP are inconsistent with the college's policy to

Election Reform

Next week's College Council elections will present the college community with an unusually large number of candidates for president and vice-president; five tickets are declared contenders, up from last year's three. Such an increase would appear to be healthy for the college political environment, and indeed, greater choice on election day is important to an active examination of the issues by all candidates.

Quantity, however, is not so much an end unto itself as it is a means to some greater goal. In fact, quantity for the mere sake of quantity can be dangerous to the kind of vigorous political discussion so crucial to worthwhile student government.

The College Council election procedure as it exists now encourages a large field of candidates. The simplicity and ease of declaring a candidacy does little to weed out the less serious candidates from those who have put real work into their races. Such less-than-serious candidacies only detract from the substantive evaluation of campus problems and issues. In order to prevent such possible damage to the political life of the college, several reforms of the election process are necessary.

First, all candidates should be required to prepare and submit to College Council a petition bearing the signatures of at least 50 students. Such petitions would guarantee some measure of popular support for the candidates, while at the same time indicating a certain level of commitment to real work on the part of the candidates.

Second, more public forums should be provided in which the candidates could clearly spell out their positions on pertinent issues. One such forum already exists (and will take take place tonight at 7:30). A useful addition, however, would be smaller, informal, and more numerous meetings. House and entry snacks suggest themselves as opportune moments for candidates to approach the student body.

Many candidates have already opted for this method of reaching students but are constrained by the relatively short campaign period. Although significantly longer than last year's, the period of time available for campaign activities is still too short for an effective exposure of all candidates to the campus community. Lengthening the period by another week would provide more opportunities for interaction between candidates and voters.

These reforms could help increase the seriousness and effectiveness of College Council campaigns. Ultimately, however, the nature of these elections depends upon the general attitude of the student body. The successful candidates should be those who have clearly demonstrated their interest and ability to address campus and community concerns. No reform or candidacy requirement will insure a worthwhile election process. Such a guarantee rests with the electorate.

Quotation of the Week

"None of the nerd candidates drinks or goes to parties, but we don't have any objections to other people doing so."

Security

To the Editor:

I would like to draw your attention to the open meeting on the question of campus security that is being sponsored by the Committee on Undergraduate Life this Thursday at 7.30 PM in Driscoll Lounge.

In light of the recent rape on campus, it is especially imperative that all of the aspects of security at Williams be examined and that weaknesses be corrected. The CUL is holding this open meeting in order to gather more ideas and to insure that we overlook nothing as we formulate our recommendations for the Dean's Office. Though the format for this meeting will be left open, some areas that we would like to hear about from you are lighting on campus (where? brighter?), locks (on the dorms? safer, more durable on room doors?), and security phones. We need to know how you feel about these potential changes. We also need your new ideas.

I know from conversations with many of you that the rape has made you more aware of security issues. Let's therefore work together to insure that nothing like that happens again here on our campus. I urge you to let your ideas be heard on Thursday night.

Evidence?

To the Editor:

The Record's skewed perspective of history has underscored the fact that this newspaper is not equipped to be a forum for debate on issues of race. Based upon the Record's demand for empirical evidence of racism, one can only presume that the Record does not keep track of the historical information that it disseminates. It was only a few months ago that Averil Clarke wrote a piece that raised many of the same concerns that were presented in the WBSU letter, and it has been only three weeks ago since Whaneema Lubiano wrote about the racism she and her family have encountered in this community. One has to be ahistorical to presume that these cases do not represent empirical evidence of racism.

Furthermore, the demand for empirical evidence is based on three fallacious assumptions: one, that when empirical evidence has been provided people will act to correct an injustice; two, that Black students have not been involved in presenting incidents of racial intolerance to administrators, other students, faculty, deans, and trustees; and three, that racism can neatly be quantified.

These are ludicrous assumptions. Briefly, one must look at the history of Blacks at Williams College.

Since the Hopkins Hall takeover in 1969, Black students have been involved in a rigorous process of bringing racial tension to the foreground. They have participated in numerous discussions with campus leaders, administrators, trustees, and faculty.

In addition, they have planned numerous cultural and educational events for the community. Across a span of more than fifteen years Black students have been providing evidence of racism and presenting methods for coping with racial intolerance. Like Sisyphus, Black students have been repeatedly rolling a rock up the same hill only to watch it fall down the hill into the abyss.

With this in mind, the empiricists must recognize that racism is not new on this campus. There is a body of evidence and history that has been compiled throughout the process of Black struggle on this campus. That history points to incidents of racial intolerance (More questions? See examples in February 24, 1987 Transcript).

Furthermore, communicating this information to the Williams community has not been effective in engendering institutional change. The major changes that have been effected at Williams have come through direct action. This fact forces one to recognize that the demand for empirical evidence is a tactic used to elude confrontation. In the face of this scandal one is reminded — "If you don't stand for nothing, you'll go for anything!"

Druids

To the Editor:

We, the members of the Purple Druids, a student environmental awareness group, wish to express our concern over proposed development in Hopkins Forest. While we understand the College's need for expanded faculty housing, we are vehemently opposed to any construction in this area, and ask the community to consider the following issues.

The glimpse from the top of the peak: March cabin fever

by Nat McCormick '88

Rocky does it on public stairways, Arnold does it in mirrored rooms. Pee Wee Herman does it on a bicycle seat, and while all other resemblances are purely coincidental, so do I.

For the past month or so, I've had cabin fever, a common winter malady. Just about everyone gets it. Confined to your room by the cold, you only go out for the basics: classes, meals, and the Winter Carnival trike race. In your room, even as you gulp your tenth mug chocolate, and groove to the latest Spinal Tap album, the subtle symptoms of cabin fever set in.

A late night scenario: you are playing your roommate in a best of 100 backgammon series, partly to procrastinate, and partly because your professors have been so merciless in class that it gives you pleasure to anticipate administering the thrashing. As you set up the board, however, your roommate pulls off his sneakers and puts his feet up on the table. With uncharacteristic quickness, you pinpoint the origin of the odor that has been peeling the wallpaper all winter, and, overpowered, you lose the game.

There are a number of ways to react, and at first I considered placing a small piece of strong cheese or raw fish behind his radiator, positive that the ensuing week would provoke him to shower, clean his room, do his laundry, and buy a new pair of sneakers. Unwilling to gamble, however, I chose different approach, deciding to ignore all winter inclinations and go out. Like Rocky, Arnold and Pee Wee, I decided to get some exercise.

Cabin fever can drive one to unusual extremes. I could have stayed inside and watched Richard Simmons on TV, Jane Fonda on video, or figured out what to do with all the Spanish Inquisition salvage up in the weight room. Instead, I borrowed a bicycle and, for the first time since the Fall, went outdoors of my own accord.

Not quite sure how to go about this exercise stuff, I sought advice from a friend who was hooked on it. He told me to do LSD-PCP. Before I could object, he explained that Pedalling at Constant Pace would assure success in a Long Slow Distance ride — provided that I also drank like a fish. Before I could concur, he added that I should drink what a fish drinks, and sent me on my way.

I pedalled off on my first trip only to discover that all directions led uphill. In sports, facing such a challenge is usually called a character building experience. For me, ascending these pernicious topographical phenomena served more as a vocabulary building experience. Fortunately, when I finally ran out of epithets, I also ran out of slope. Yet, when I dismounted, I discovered a second-meaning of LSD — Leg Spaghetti Disease, familiar to anyone who climbs hills, whether by Nike or bike.

I also discovered that I was no longer at the foot of the mount. I had come to a college literally located in a valley, to learn, metaphorically, how to ascend the mountains. For three years, I had waited for the secret to be revealed. Now, here I stood on top of a small hill, gazing around at the numerous peaks which faded into the horizon, and beginning to understand some words read in a class long ago, how "all experience is an arch wherethrough/ Gleams that untravelled world, whose margin fades/ For ever and ever when I move."

When my breath returned, I wiped the sweat from my forehead and continued my ride. And when I returned, the valley air seemed heavy with a peculiar odor, worse perhaps than that of old sneakers, cheese, and raw fish combined. Then I realized that it was the earth unfrozen by a week of mild weather, and, from that point on, it smelled wonderful. Back in the dorm that evening, I let my roommate thrash me in another game of backgammon.

Williams must purge itself of the wrongs of divisive racism

by Dilip Nair '88

The last few weeks have seen the rise of racial tension in our community. My distress at the situation, my fear of what could lie ahead for us if we are not able to stem this deadly ebb of understanding and respect amongst the members of our community, my personal experiences with racial prejudices and hostility; all these things prompt me to share my thoughts and feelings with you.

Let me say first that I wish I were completely anonymous, that nobody knew what color I am, that it would not be possible to make inferences about my racial origin from what I write. I wish I could be considered first and foremost a human being and then and only then a member of a particular racial group. I have always, ever since childhood, tried to think of myself and of others in this manner; but now it is becoming increasingly difficult to do this.

Now the words I read in college publications and the comments I hear on campus, make me conscious, in a way that is distressing, that the person next to me is white, or is black or is some shade in between. Surely, it ought not to be this way...

Let me say too that I am no stranger to the pain and bitterness that comes with being a victim of racism. I grew up in a multiracial mining town in the heart of south-central Africa. I became painfully familiar with white, black, or brown racists. There were parts of the town into

Housing in Hopkins deserves a debate by this community

by Chris Finch '87

It's easy to look at the plan to develop six housing lots in Hopkins Forest and say "big deal". It's easy to say, "I don't really think building houses in the Forest is such a good idea, but if they do, I'd like one." It's easy to say, "the decision has been made, so why bother." On the other hand, it's also not too difficult to say, "They shouldn't touch even the smallest pine needle in the Forest." Unfortunately the issues at stake behind the present development are no less complex than in any land use decision. What is strange about the Forest, however, is the lack of information about the whole development plan and the rapidity with which the plan is expected to be carried out.

On the one hand, Williams supports the idea of "free intellectual debate", free exchange of ideas, information, and viewpoints. On the other hand, there are those things one should not raise a fuss about: "It's a delicate issue," "It's in the college's best interest." With Hopkins Forest, much is proposed to happen, little public discussion has taken place.

It seems strange that we, the Williams community, are tacitly accepting a development within the boundaries of our own forest when so much about the project appears to remain uncertain. Given the uniqueness of this resource and the irreversibility of any development on it, it would seem sensible and far-sighted to try to avoid development if at all possible. When asked why it is necessary to develop the Forest with the Pine Cobble project only 1½-2 years down the road, on the one hand, administrators respond that the Pine Cobble development is still somewhat tentative. If this is the case, why go ahead and develop our own forest when it is not at all certain that the development is even necessary? On the other hand, it is claimed that the Forest project is necessary immediately, regardless of Pine Cobble, to fulfill an overwhelming faculty need and as an important part of future recruitment efforts. What is not addressed, however, is the question, what kind of effect will six houses have on either consideration?

From where comes so desperate a need that it cannot wait until the Pine Cobble development or at least until more is known about the time-frame associated with Pine Cobble? On the one hand, houses are needed by young faculty who cannot afford or find housing on the ever-tighter Williamstown market: "...we have to be fair to the newest generation of faculty who cannot afford building lots otherwise," (Winthrop Wassenar, director of

Without basking in the limelight of hot, current issues, outgoing College Council President Amy Jeffress '87 and her administration have quietly fulfilled their goals and aims for this year.

Jeffress, Vice-president Suzanne Biemiller '87, Secretary Wendell Chestnut '88, and Treasurer Alec Dawson '87 have worked hard within the Williams College system to increase communication between the College Council and the administration and between the Council and standing faculty/student committees and at the same time investigated the student's role in the tenure process.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix pointed to increased contact and understanding between the administration and College Council and better use of the liason system between the Council and committees as the two greatest successes of the Jeffress term.

Another Word
by Andrew Mayer

Both Fix and Jeffress stressed the success of weekly lunch meetings between Fix and the Council Board. Fix called the meetings "very helpful and productive," and said they served to get each other up to date on College activities or to allow debate on one issue. In addition, Record editors were invited to the meetings on an irregular basis to discuss the representation of the Council in the paper.

The better use of the liason system, which requires certain committee members to report back on the committee activity to the Council, has allowed Jeffress and others to act on issues during initial stages and in conjunction with the committees. A current example of this is the work of both the Committee on Undergraduate Life and Colleg Council on increasing campus security.

Perhaps remembering the controversy sparked last year by the Gaudino Committee "surprises" of theme housing and a freshman residential entry, Fix highlighted the increased communication between the College Council and committees as the main reason for the lack of shock on the Council this year. This absence of controversy, while limiting, perhaps unjustifiably, the Council's publicity, has allowed them to quietly go about their work.

During a comprehensive look of the tenure process, the College Council investigated minority hiring and affirmative action. In addition, Dean of the Faculty John Reichert and Assistant to the President Nancy McIntire spoke to the Council. During Winter Study, the Council examination of tenure concluded and a flyer explaining the process was distributed to all students.

As I will explain next week, in addition to these activities, the College Council under Amy Jeffress has devoted time to causes which reflect the larger scope of Williams' interests. However complaints have been registered that Jeffress, Biemiller, and company have not focused their attention on hot issues such as divestment and party policy.

It seems as though the Council's critics either have a short-term memory or seriously overestimate the power of College Council at Williams.

This is the first of two articles. Next week: Countering the critics: the meatless meal, divestment, and the larger scope taken by College Council under Amy Jeffress.

CUL examines campus lock system proposals

by Peter Balaban

A subcommittee of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) is examining campus security and preparing to make recommendations to the Dean's office later this year.

The subcommittee, which met for the first time two weeks ago, is considering installing locks on entrances to dormitories and buildings.

One system, suggested at the meeting by Director of Housing Robert Fowler, would use student identification cards as keys to dormitories.

Only Williams people

According to Security Director Ransom Jenks, the type of system suggested at the meeting would be designed so "only those people with Williams ID's would be allowed into any of our dormitories. (This system) could keep out thieves and potential rapists."

Jenks added that "more people would feel more secure in their spaces if they knew that only Williams people were coming in."

"Apparently they (the card verifying devices) can be programmed to lock and unlock at various times of day," said CUL Chairman William Wagner.

Timed lock system

He added that the card-checking devices could be programmed so that certain campus buildings could remain open later than others, and said this setup "seemed to us to be a very attractive security measure."

Jenks said that he didn't see the logic behind having doors to dormitories open during the day and locked at night. He said that unless they would be locked all the time, the college "shouldn't waste money on it."

Jenks said, "If we have a card entry system, we'll be able to tell if all of our problems (security) are internal."

He said that although the system has the capability to record the names of students as they enter buildings and the time they enter, he did not anticipate that the college would want access to that information. "That has a tendency to invade privacy," he said.

"Opt for protection"

Wagner said the effect of installing the card system on the 'open' atmosphere at Williams would be minimal. "If it comes to a question of affecting people's psychology slightly or protecting people, I would personally opt for protection.

"I can't see that it would have any effect on residential life at all," said Dean Mary Kenyatta. "People can't leave their (room) doors unlocked," she added, "That's why thieves come (to Williams) from as far as Springfield."

The subcommittee examined a number of alternatives for locks for dormitory and building doors beside the card system, and is also considering improving or changing locks on room doors, said Fowler.

He said "I don't know if electronic locks are the answer. There are many ways that we can do this." Wagner said that the CUL asked security and the housing director to "supply an array of options," and stressed that "at this point we are simply looking at possibilities."

$1500 per door

Jenks said that each door where the card entry system is installed would cost approximately $1500. He said some entrances to buildings would have to be closed permanently to cut down on the cost of the system, and a study would have to be undertaken to see which entrances are most used.

He said that his office proposed the card entry system to the Dean's office several years ago, but the Deans were not interested in the idea at the time.

The CUL was charged with making a report to the Dean's office on its recommendations for new security measures

Norton speaks on black family life

by Lisa Nahf

The American family as an institution is "at its roots being tested by new and unprecedented demands," Eleanor Holmes Norton said last Friday.

Norton's lecture, entitled "The Black Family: Building on the Past and Hoping Toward the Future" was part of last week's conference "The Black Family in America and The Feminization of Poverty". She is a professor of law at Georgetown University.

Norton cited the rising rates of teenage pregnancy, divorce and female-headed households as destroying the family structure.

Norton centered on teenage pregnancy as promoting disadvantage from generation to generation. She said, "their initial lack of education and other opportunities haunt these mothers and their children for the rest of their lives."

"59 percent of all black children are born to single mothers—the mothers who are least able to provide for them," she said. "Their poverty permanently ties them to the welfare system and does not facilitate economic independence."

Norton said that the deterioration of the extended family, which she called "the single most important protection from the ravages of racism and poverty", has caused individual families to suffer on their own.

"Something must be done before this problem eats away at the foundations of the black family," she stated. "I am apalled at the absence of significant federal initiative."

"Aid for Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) needs to be reconceptualized and redesigned. It holds women

Panelists discuss role of black mothers

by Susanne Abell

Last week, Joyce Ladner, Michelene Malson, and Carol Stack spoke on "The Black Family in Society" as part of a series of lectures for the conference: "The Black Family in America and the Feminization of Poverty."

They spoke about the situation of blacks in America today and, in particular, the condition of single black women heading households. All of them pointed out that the situation for blacks today is critical and is characterized by high rates of unemployment and teen-age pregnancy as well as violence and drug and alcohol abuse.

Ladner, a sociology professor from the Howard University School of Social Work, spoke about the economic problems created as a result of the increasing number of single black women heading households and their dual role as breadwinners and child-rearers.

She said that marriage is no longer an expected tradition for black women and that this has a long-term effect on the structure of the black family.

Malson, who is from the Center for Research on Women at Wellesley College, based her talk on research she had done in 1979 in which she had "dared to look at black families from a non-pathological perspective."

Panelists speak on the feminization of poverty during the conference "The Black Family and the Feminization of Poverty" Friday. (Ward)

Her findings demonstrated that, contrary to commonly held views, single black women with children did not fit a stereotype associated with deviance, amoral behavior and underprivileged backgrounds.

Her sample of women interviewed represented a wide range of socio-economic backgrounds, and most of all a range of different attitudes toward their situations.

Stack, who is from the Institute of Policy Sciences at Duke, spoke of the recent wave of migration of black women from northeastern cities to southern rural areas.

The social context of this migration tendency is that during the 1960s and 1970s many blacks left the South and went North for work, leaving their children home with their grandparents. Many black women are now returning home after dissatisfying experiences in the North. This return migration was described by Stack as an intergenerational loop.

College Council

The College Council last week passed a resolution on academic advising in response to the Williams Black Student Union's (WBSU) all-campus letter of February 12.

The resolution recommends that the academic advising committee of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) strive to address the needs of students from less privileged high schools and socio-economic backgrounds.

The WBSU's letter called for "an educational program on racism and intolerance to take place this semester with full participation by faculty, staff, students and administrators."

In other business, the council discussed various possible follow-ups to tommorow's rape awareness panel. Among the suggestions were that Peer Health incorporate the topic in its entry talks, that discussion groups and/or special counseling be available at Health Services for rape victims and that there be workshops for men on sexual relations, focusing on the problem of sexual harassment.

2 prof's get named chairs

Two professors have been awarded named professorships in recognition of their contributions to the college. Their appointments, effective at the beginning of second semester, were approved by the college trustees at their January meeting.

Daniel O'Connor, professor of philosophy and current director of the Williams-Oxford Program, was named the Massachusetts Professor of Philosophy.

Gary Jacobsohn, professor of political science and chairman of the department, was named the Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government.

O'Connor served as Dean of the College for six years, resigning to become the first resident director of the Williams-Oxford program. He has been a member of the Williams faculty since 1961. He received his B.A. from the University of Detroit and his Ph.D. from Yale University. After a sabbatical leave during the 1987-88 academic year, he will return to Williams to teach philosophy.

Jacobsohn, who has taught at Williams since 1971, specializes in Constitutional law and American political thought. He has written extensively on constitutional and political issues. Jacobsohn has been active on a number of college committees, and he has served as chairman of his department since 1984. He graduated from the City College of New York, and he received his Ph.D. from Cornell University.

Fellowships for 6 students

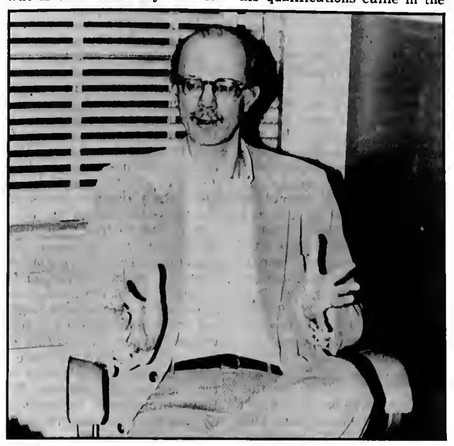
Six seniors have been awarded fellowships by the college for two years of study in England. William Hollands, Cynthia Kiser, Michael Mellis, Jessie Marshall and Thomas Perkins are recipients of Herchel Smith Fellowhips for study at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Michael Weber has received the John Moody Fellowhip for study at Exeter College, Oxford.

The Herchel Smith Fellowhip was established in 1979 by Dr. Herchel Smith, a retired organic chemist who received his doctoral degree from Emmanuel College. John Moody established the John Moody Fellowship in memory of his son, a 1921 Williams graduate. Both fellowships provide for living, educational and travel expenses for two years of graduate study.

Alumni donate more than ever

John Walsh, the college's director of annual giving, announced that the 1986 Alumni Fund, which concluded its annual campaign January 31, received $3,914,300 from 68.8 percent of the college's alumni. Both the money and the level of participation broke records.

Walsh said that the amount raised exceeded last year's total by $636,500. This is the largest year-to-year increase in the history of the Fund. The Fund has grown steadily over the past 10 years. It exceeded $2 million for the first time in 1981, and in the past two years contributions have increased by more than $1 million.



The Williams Alumni Fund has the highest participation rate among all colleges and universities with a national constituency.

Profile: Writer Steven Millhauser

by John Basedow

A new face adorned the pages of Ephpersonnel this September. Steven Millhauser, visiting associate professor of English professor Jim Shepard, who is on leave this year. His courseload for the year consists of English 101 classes and introductory and advanced fiction writing courses.

Millhauser was offered this position with no prior full time teaching experience. Instead, his qualifications came in the form of published works of fiction.

Visiting Associate Professor of English Steven Millhauser (Kershaw)

The first of these works, Edwin Mullhouse: The Life and Death of an American Writer (1943-1954) by Jeffrey Cartwright, is his most critically acclaimed. He began writing it while still in graduate school at Brown University. Millhauser classified himself as a slow writer, noting that it took him three years to complete this novel.

It is set in childhood and largely draws upon his own experiences, he said. "It recounts the artistic development of Edwin Mullhouse as told by a somewhat pompous biographer," he explained.

Further than that, Millhauser refused to specify. He said he believes that a writer creates books and should be silent about them. He also said that he desires his works to either "make whatever appeal they have or fail entirely."

Millhauser achieved his second literary success five years later with Portrait of a Romantic. This novel portrays the condition of adolescence as a state of romanticism.

Last year proved to be a very productive one for Millhauser

WCMA Wallworks project: Haas' mural graces atrium

by Beth Broadrup

The scaffolding now on view in the atrium of the Williams College Museum of Art is not a new piece of modern sculpture being featured in current exhibitions of American realism. Sometimes scaffolding is just scaffolding. In this case, the real work of art is what is hidden by the criss-crossed poles: the wall, on which artist Richard Haas is creating a mural.

Haas' contribution is the first of four murals planned in the "Wallworks" project, which received a partial "New Works" grant from the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities. The "Wallworks" project will encompass the next two years, in which time four contemporary artists will each create an 850-square-foot mural remaining on view for five to six months. The participating artists, whose styles reflect the range from realism to abstraction, are Richard Haas, Mike Glier, William Ramage, and Sol LeWitt.

Daunting height

When completed, each of the murals will surely command the attention of museum visitors as they enter the museum's atrium. Not only will the mural's colors stand out from the atrium's blazingly white walls, but its scale alone will dominate the space. The wall on which the murals will be painted, to the left as one descends the stairs to the art offices, is three stories high (that's 35 feet to you and me). If the wall's height is not daunting enough, it presents an even greater challenge to artists: because it stands behind a staircase and an aerial walkway, no point exists from which the entire wall is visible.

The drawing of the completed mural that Haas submitted to the museum featured an image of the combined architectural styles that exist in the art museum itself. The two styles, which work together harmoniously in the museum's design, even though they are radically different, are Greek revival, embodied in the 1846 rotunda, and post-modern, seen in the recent additions by Charles Moore.

False fronts

Richard Haas is known for the realistic architectural images he has painted on the sides of fairly plain buildings, images that are so lifelike as to deceive viewers into believing the facades are real. Haas' first

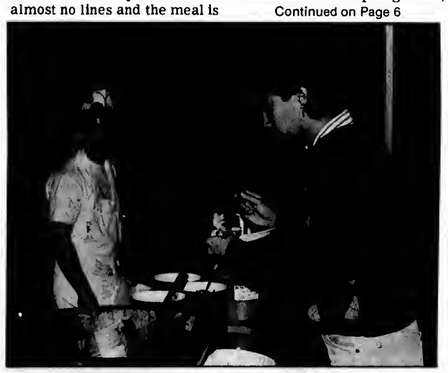
Dog House serves wieners with all the works

by Erik T. Burns

If you're tired of wasting your life away standing in the Baxter lunch line or tired of watching the MTV Closet Classics Capsule at the Log during lunch hour, perhaps it's time you tried a new eating experience.



Unbeknownst to many on campus, there exists a mini-dining hall, affectionately known as the Dog House, in the basement of Baxter Hall. It is located down the stairs and to the left, in the space that is used as a pool room during the rest of the day.

Regulars

This Snoopyesque establishment, replete with green baize pool tables and WWII Flying Ace root beer, serves a daily lunchtime mini-extravaganza consisting solely of hot dogs, chili and the requisite condiments. As at any fine eating establishment, the menu never varies, but this doesn't seem to faze the ninety or so people who eat there every day. According to Gary Blake, a part-time Food Service worker, at least half of the Dog House patrons are regulars.

The Dog House is a good place to go for a quick lunch, a bite on the run before class or other afternoon activity. There are almost no lines and the meal is completely self-served, allowing the pre-New York business-person a chance to gain valuable career training by mastering the three-minute business lunch: piling chili,

Greene shows technical mastery and artistic innovation with diverse music

by Mark Canuel

For the second consecutive year, the Department of Music presented a Thompson concert featuring a young, internationally acclaimed pianist. Christopher O'Riley appeared in January of 1986, and, last Tuesday evening in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, Arthur Greene performed an equally impressive concert featuring music by Bach, Ives, Holby, Chopin, and Liszt. Greene, a powerful performer with an imposing array of prizes to his name, played a diverse selection of music with a technical mastery and artistic innovation that are rarely found together.

Greene opened his program with J.S. Bach's Italian Concerto BMV 971. Although this piece may be all too familiar to students of piano, Greene's interpretation exuded freshness and vigor. The first movement suffered slightly from a lack of variation in dynamics and an overpowering right hand in some places. The following Andante, however, revealed a graceful touch, sensitive to the nuances in sound. The final Presto movement had vitality and a driving rhythm that brought the piece to a triumphant close.

Changing moods

The first and third movements of Ives' Sonata No. 2 — the "Concord" sonata — followed. The first movement, entitled "Emerson," is an extended, almost amorphous piece. Its improvisational, rhapsodic quality vividly recalls the style of the writer after whom it is named. Greene performed "Emerson" and "Alcotts," the second movement, with a depth of feeling that reflected the constantly

A modest proposal:

Alternative entertainment

by Carolyn O'Brien

Okay, how early did you give up looking for a party Friday night? Yes, the Springstreeters were great at the Log. No, there was not a party at Currier. And how many of you are chuckling saying "Huh! they (the ominous party-searchers) didn't find out about our keg and I staved warm."?

Unfortunately, the secret keg-hoggers, whoever they may be, escape expose this week. Rather, I have something else I feel bound to reveal to the Billsville community — fortunately it doesn't concern me, so I feel no qualms about revealing the dirty facts. In the wake of the recently declared campus-wide state of Zolto, also known as no parties, a rare and unique practice has emerged as weekend entertainment. No, it does not involve any books or any contraband substances; as far as I know it is not illegal. Before I reveal this activity and am hit by a backslash of denial, may I just add that this is on a very small scale and those involved know who they are.

This alternate entertainment, this so-far Zolto sanctioned action is called, no you couldn't have guessed it — DATING!!! I do not jest. These are real people, actual schoolmates of you and I involved in this practice. I know of more than two! but heck, this is investigative reporting. Unfortunately I am not at liberty to reveal my sources — for reasons of privacy and possible jealous rages. One female friend of mine has yet to get out of the neck-brace from when I grabbed her collar and said, somewhat loudly, "YOU HAVE A WHAT?"

Fortunately, however, for any brave souls for whom challenge and new ideas are an integral part of a liberal arts education, I have garnered some information on what exactly is necessary for the pursuit of this entertainment. Let's skip to the easiest parts first.

One) Eating. Everyone enjoys eating at some time, particularly after a week of mushroom surprise and chicken-don't-ask. Going off campus (i.e., paying for food), can be quite a social activity and is legal as far as my sources can tell. It's up to you to answer correctly when they ask you whether you'd like a cocktail.

Two) Movies. Despite what you may have heard, Bronfman is not the only place to see film in this area. Movies are particularly good as an option if it involves getting out of town and going to Friendly's (see above).

Three) Theatre. Although probably in town and required for class, it could be one of your most memorable class assignments. A post play discussion could test your mother's claim that, "Of course the boys/girls will like you for your intelligence, dear."

Four) Be imaginative. Give me a break, there haven't been many examples to gather information from.

My sources remind me to mention the more difficult aspect of this form of entertainment, beyond choosing an activity. This is obtaining a "datee," someone with whom to engage in these activities. Since this is possibly the hardest part of entertaining yourself since stair-diving without alcohol, a few do's and don't's are in order. Do mention any majors or classes in common for starters ... do not make that the pretense for the date. I challenge you to connect Russian Literature in Translation to Crocodile Dundee anyway. Do express interest in the person's interests ... do not say you'd like to see their posters.

Finally, the President and Board of Trustees of Williams College, the Record editorial staff and the author take no responsibility for the success or failure of any of the activities mentioned in this article. Although it would be fun to hear of any attempts.

Williams Trio concert in review

by Thomas Cunningham

At 8 o'clock on Friday night, the Williams Trio performed pieces by Mozart, Dvorak, and Franck. The regular pairing of Doris Stevenson and Douglas Moore was supplemented by guest violinist Timothy Baker, a nationally renowned violinist, for performances of Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat Major and Dvorak's Dumky Trio in E Minor. The Trio was expanded to a quintet by Catherine Metz and Lois Martin for the performance of Cesar Franck's Quintet for Piano and Strings in F Minor.

The first movement of the Mozart showed immediately how well pianist Stevenson's fluid phrasing combined with the energetic and precise playing of Baker. Their melodic duplications and interchanges were delightful to listen to. The slower second movement brought Baker's lyrical playing to the fore, emphasized nicely by cellist Moore's flowing accompaniment. The final movement again demonstrated the beauty of the pairing of Stevenson and Baker as they brought the piece to a close.

Dvorak's Dumky Trio is an unusual piece in that it utilizes the forms of old Czechoslovokian folk songs which alternate slow, mournful melodies with dance-like ones. The problem here was that the trio amply brought out the mournful nature of Dvorak's theme, but failed to impart to the listener the sense of gaiety and dancing implicit within the contrasting sections.

Mournful melodies

Moore's playing was the driving force of this piece. Not only was his cello the main melodic force, but it often led us smoothly from section to section. However, his impassioned playing that had defined the slow movements somehow seemed to lose its verve during the fast movements. Stevenson's playing was similar, as it seemed to fail to utilize the percussive nature of the piano to define a sense of dancing. Despite these faults, the trio vividly captured the impressionistic essence of Dvorak's piece.

The Franck was not weighted with any of these problems. The four member string section created a sound that contrasted beautifully with the piano. This was immediately apparent, because of the cyclical nature of the piece, in which a theme was iterated by the strings alone, to be followed by a contrasting one from the piano. Here again the beatiful lyrical quality of Stevenson's playing was apparent, and it was a pleasure to listen to her interchange with the strings, led aptly by Baker.

Impassioned playing

Martin's viola also added to the first movement, especially at its conclusion. The second movement allowed us to be treated to the combination of Baker and Moore as they once again defined perfectly the mood of the movement, backed nicely by Martin, and violinist Metz. Here also the energy of the contrasting piano was central to the section. The final movement was perhaps the most impassioned playing of the night. The piano was the dominating force of the quintet as Stevenson's percussive energy led the strings to create and release tension, culminating in the explosively resolved finale.

The concert was dedicated to the memory of Lawrence W. Beals, professor of philosophy, emeritus, a long time friend of music at Williams.

as both In the Penny Arcade and From the Realm of Morpheus were published. In the Penny Arcade is comprised of a novella and six short stories, while From the Realm of Morpheus is a novel chock full of underground adventures based in the fantastic.

Millhauser said he finds the critical reviews of his works to be "sharply mixed." He said that he expected this because "(his) writing is not middle of the road and tends to attract strong interest or to immediately repel."

Though Millhauser has achieved a large degree of success, he said he will always think of himself as "a struggling writer." He spent four years on his first novel, which failed to achieve publication. He said, however, that it was this accomplishment that caused him to become a writer in his own mind.

During the lean periods of his career and in between novels, Millhauser took up residence in his parent's attic and supported himself with a myriad of odd jobs. The most notable was a position as a re-writeman for Wrestling Review, which he agreed was comparable to The National Enquirer with respect to validity. He remembered this position as "the job (he) was least suited to in his entire life."

On the subject of teaching someone how to write, Millhauser said that he recognizes the possibility of refining a talent that is present, yet remained staunch in his belief that "you can't teach people to see the world in a spellbinding and original way."

Future works

When asked about his own future works, Millhauser simply replied that he hasn't had much time to think of anything aside from student writing. He also said that he was quite pleasantly surprised and impressed with the writing talents of his students.

Next year the author will have enough time to concentrate on his own creations when he takes advantage of a writing grant bestowed upon him by the National Endowment for the Arts. Looking towards the future, he said he plans to find a university position that will permit him to continue writing. Never to be satisfied with teaching alone, he stated he is anxiously waiting to "get back in harness."

Atmosphere

The casual observer might feel that a constant diet of hot dogs and chili would be bad for one's gastrointestinal tract, especially considering the less than exuberant attitude held by many on the nutritional value and taste of the average hot dog. But the hot dogs served at the Dog House seem to transcend these petty prejudices. As one patron (who preferred to remain anonymous) said, "Compared to what I expected, this is like Maxine's!" Maybe it's the atmosphere.

The Dog House is open from 11:30 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., Monday through Friday. The meal can only be "purchased" through the regular meal plan using a student ID card; no cash or chits are accepted. Shirts and shoes required for service.

In a conscious attempt to better student life and student relations on campus, we aim to concentrate our agenda on issues directly related to such concerns.

Our first aim will be to approve a final college policy on divestment. We will encourage the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition and the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility to come up with solid propositions and evidence to back their views. Considering that they both have researched the issue thoroughly we will wholeheartedly back their opinions. By the end of our time in office the college policy should be final.

In the spirit of bettering student relations we will focus our attention on gender and race relations. From past Record articles it is obvious that these are great concerns and we intend to bring them to the surface. How? By encouraging people to come up and express their feelings, face the problems instead of denying them, and by informing the campus about them. The latest series of lectures and panels gives us the impression that we are on a good start.

No student relations can be improved, however, if students are not offered opportunities to come together. The new party policy which is about to be released by the administration will be studied very carefully. Our aim will be to face the administration with your proposals. Proposals that will make sure that no more wounds are inflicted upon our social life. The scars from the Log and freshman party policy are painful enough.

Other issues on our agenda will include freshman housing, the Junior Advisor selection process and the housing selection process. Concern for these issues binds us to look into them thoroughly.

At the same time we do not intend to await disaster in order to take action. By encouraging the voicing of your worries and your hopes we will be able to act on issues before they become problematic. We intend to bring the College Council closer to you and make it part of your concerns: a vehicle to improve campus life.

Tired of parties closing at 9:20? Tired of two exams in one day? Tired of $20 parking tickets? We're tired too. Consider our proposals.

EXPERIENCE: A lot. Dave: College Council (CC), Freshman Council and head of the CC Committee on Tenure. Andy: College Council, WCFM Board of Directors and JA in Morgan.

TWO PARTY RULE: There should be two parties on both Friday and Saturday nights. The best evenings this fall were when multiple parties prevented crowding. Moving aound was easy. Dancing was accident-free. Conversation was enjoyable. It was like Winter Carnival or Spring Weekend. All parties should be this way.

SELF—SCHEDULED EXAMS: All Finals for classes of less than 40 students should be self-scheduled. The times of any scheduled finals should be posted before classes are chosen at registration. Self-scheduling works at Smith and Wellesley. Pre-registration scheduling works at Harvard and Wheaton. Both (or either) would work here.

$5 TICKETS: All parking tickets should be $5. The only legitimate justification for $20 tickets is to prevent gridlock. We'd bet that $5 tickets would do the job. It's worth a try. At a Housing Committee meeting, Security was (mildly) receptive to the idea (provided that everyone paid on time).

LATE DINNER AT THE LOG: An obviously good idea. We don't have the space here to discuss in detail everything that should be done, so look for our posters. In outline, here's the plan:

MEANS I: Persuasion. Self-scheduled exams, printing the exam schedule before registration, dinner at the Log and $5 parking tickets are good ideas. They only need a voice. We'll be that voice. We'll go to the administration again and again and again. Meatless meals and Log lunches were the direct result of CC pressure. Persuasion works.

MEANS II: Money. When persuasion doesn't work, money does. CC spends over $150,000 a year on whatever it chooses. Through either persuasion or money, we would try to achieve the following: One, free security at parties. Two, a doubling of the roughly $2000 yearly grant that the College gives to each house (depending on its size). Three, an extra $10,000 to SAC for the purpose of throwing all-campus parties. Four, a "Party Calendar" in Housing Committee that would plan parties several weeks in advance to ensure the two-per-night goal.

THEME: We just want to make Williams College a better and more enjoyable place to go to school. Some of our ideas may not work. But that's what they said about Log lunches and meatless meals. You never know until you try.

Zinn/Melcher

Carter Zinn '88 and Nicole Melcher '88. (Albright)

As involved members of the Williams community we have a fresh perspective on issues that are important to students and a new optimism regarding what the College Council can do to represent students. Through our participation in a wide variety of college activities and leadership positions — such as President of the Junior Advisors, College Council Finance Committee, and House Treasurer — we are ready to lead the council in a new direction.

First on our list of initiatives is the institution of a new framework for addressing the important concerns of black students. If elected, we will invite all concerned black students to speak before a standing committee to relate incidents and attitudes about racism at Williams. Once this work is done, the committee will present a description of the situation and a list of specific proposals to achieve positive change.

We think that the anger expressed by blacks at Williams is justifiable, and we do not pretend that this committee can eliminate a situation that is symptomatic of a social condition. We simply feel that this anger can be communicated in a more productive way, elevating the issue from antagonistic exchanges to useful dialogue.

Another important issue is developing a party policy that maintains the social atmosphere provided by all-campus parties. Our primary objective is to reduce the financial burden on residential houses that are not allowed to charge admission to parties. We plan to support a policy like the SAC's that will establish a general party fund to cover costs for frequent all-campus parties. We will also strive to minimize the liability of any one organization that sponsors a party.

The composition of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions which is ultimately responsible for tenure and hiring decisions is also an issue of concern. We find the all-white male composition of the CAP inconsistent with the college's policy of increasing the number of women and minorities on the faculty. We will push to broaden the eligibility requirement for CAP members so as to include all tenured professors and not just full professors. We hope that increasing the size of the CAP's applicant pool will lead to a more diverse composition of the committee.

Vote for Carter and Nicole for a firm grasp of the issues, broad leadership experience and new expectations for the power of the College Council. We want to hear any suggestions that you may have, but are particularly interested in catchy slogans that rhyme with Melcher. Please send to S.U. 1531 or S.U. 1336. Thank you.

In order to make the College Council effective, an experienced team needs to actively solicit student opinion and wishes. We propose several new channels for student input. With our experience as representatives working on the council and with the administration, we feel that we can offer effective leadership which will lead to substantive changes.

Having served on College Council for the past year, we feel that these structural changes would improve council representation:

• More Student Input — College Council meetings have always been open. We intend to encourage public attendance at these meetings by

1. posting and publicizing the agenda
2. holding meetings in a room more conducive to large group input
3. publishing in the Record information about past and upcoming meetings

With these three policies we hope to encourage student involvement in choosing the issues which the council discusses. Similarly, we expect that students will be able to monitor the Council's activities better, to know when their concerns are and are not being addressed.

•More Representative Input — Representatives to the council need to feel a stronger connection to their constituencies and to the council leadership.

1. At-Large representatives will meet with the officers bi-weekly
2. Representatives will be more involved and have greater influence

In addition to those structural changes there is need for an additional channel for student input. We perceive that the student body does not feel accurately represented by the council. The constitution has a provision for Student Assemblies which we intend to utilize regularly in order to let students concerned with specific issues speak and vote for those concerns.

Our changes in the College Council structure and our addition of assemblies will make the council a body which confidently represents the concerns of the students.

Recognizing the students' concern about the social life at Williams, a primary test of this council's effectiveness will be in the improvement of social life.

1. College Council will pay for the music at parties. This will cut down on houses' costs of giving a party, encourage more parties and improve their quality

2. College Council will work directly with the Committee on Undergraduate Life to encourage immediate action on the CUL proposals.

With our experience and direct student input, we will accurately represent the student body and be able to push effectively for student concerns.

Hey! We are the Nerd Party's candidates for the presidency and vice-presidency of the College Council. That is, Nathan is the presidential candidate, and Ken is the vice-presidential candidate. Our party is part of what we hope will become a nationwide movement of protest in student government at colleges and universities. We have been influenced by such worthy organizations as the Monarchist Party at the University of Maryland. Here are some key items from our party platform, the complete text of which will be posted on bulletin boards around campus some time this week.

1. The new gym shall be renovated for use as a science and mathematics library (and the new pool for use as an aquarium).
2. All college-owned stock in companies doing any business in South Africa will be sold.
3. The proceeds from said sale will be used to construct a linear accelerator around Weston Field.
4. Major and distribution requirements shall be abolished.
5. All students under 21 years of age shall be declared to be 21 and provided with college identification cards affirming their new age.
6. The College Council constitution will be amended to permit students who have never served on the Finance Committee to serve as Treasurer. Our candidate, Marc Lanoue, has been denied a place on the ballot because he lacks this prerequisite. Nevertheless, the Nerd Party has decided that Marc will run as a write-in candidate. If he wins and is denied office, we will proceed with a legal challenge against those who would deny office to an outstanding candidate on a technicality.

Although some or all of these proposals may be slightly beyond the jurisdiction of the College Council, we believe that these ideas are essential for the continued vitality of the Williams community. We hope that you will share our belief that the changes we advocate would be beneficial for the entire Williams community. We encourage you to vote for our candidates: Nathan Schimke for President, Ken April for Vice-President, Bill Sherman for Secretary, and Marc Lanoue (write—in) for Treasurer.

Treasurer

TIM HAMILTON '88

The Treasurer of the College Council is both a voting member of the Council and Chairman of the Finance Committee. My three years as a council representative and two years on the Finance Committee will be extremely useful, helping me to accomplish the tasks required of this position. When preparing the budget and presenting the recommendations of the Finance Committee to College Council for approval, I would stress the importance of fair distribution of funds among the many varied student organizations which serve to strengthen our Williams experience; this includes being attentive to the needs of new or emerging groups. Please show your support by voting for me for Treasurer. I will serve with integrity.

MARK RAISBECK '88

Hi, my name is Mark Raisbeck and I am running for Treasurer. Big deal, you say? Well it is a big deal and I'll tell you why...

The Treasurer of the student council chairs the Finance Committee which is responsible for the allocation of money to student run organizations on campus. It is important that the person holding this position be able to reflect the opinions and preferences of the student body. Other qualities important in a candidate are that he or she have experience in student politics, and that he or she is responsible, dedicated and hard-working.

Looking back at the previous paragraph, I realize that I have described myself. It's a good thing that I'm running for the position, because I can't see anybody else being so perfect for the job.

My experience in student politics is broad, but more importantly, I feel that I would do a great job of reflecting the opnions of the student body in budget making decisions. For example, I feel that the organizations that reach the most people — WCFM, the SAC, The Record, etc. — are perhaps the most important groups to provide sufficient funding for, as these groups not only appeal to the widest audiences, but are vital in promoting campus unity and communication.

Please take the time to vote — hopefully for me. I promise to be a hard-working treasurer and to serve with fairness and integrity.

Secretary

TRACEY C. BLANKENSHIP '89

Communication with the student body seems such an obvious priority for our student government here at Williams. The efficiency and thoughtfulness of our communication, however, may not always seem as essential.

I think it is; and as a present College Council and Committee on Undergraduate Life member, as last year's Freshman Council president, and as current Treasurer of WCFM, I've witnessed first-hand the links between strong communication and solid progress.

I seek to serve the campus with experience and accountability. With your support, I can do just that.

HENRY KIM '89

I would like to expand the role of Secretary, which currently is too much like a stenographer just circulating weekly minutes. One of my immediate goals is to work in closer coordination with various College Council members to publish a monthly all-campus mailing that would better inform students of the activities and plans of all the representatives. Also included would be updates of some of the issue-oriented, College Council-sponsored organizations, to allow students to have culled into one convenient source much of the relevant general information.

By maintaining active communication with the student body, I will work towards fulfilling the potential the College Council has in being a viable organization that can improve the quality of our campus life.

BILL SHERMAN '88

This candidacy is by, for and through the Nerd Party, that is, my views and goals are essentially those of Schimke and April, our candidates for President and Vice-President.

The duties of the secretary consist primarily of the handling of reports, statements and communiques between and within the Council, the committees, the Dean and the community.

I can spell pretty well.

The choice is clear.

This forum for candidates' statements is sponsored by the College Council.

major work of this kind came in the mid-1970's, when he painted a cast-iron building front on the blank side wall of a SoHo building. Some of his other trademark large-scale public murals include painted storefronts on Mulberry Street in Little Italy; Prospect Place in Brooklyn; The Strand of Galveston, Texas; and Peck Slip.

Haas' later works have shied away from blatantly realistic images. He incorporates elements of fantasy and imagination into such projects as the rear facade of the Boston Architectural Center; a three-sided, 20-story mural on an apartment house in Chicago; and a three-dimensional mural of the Times Tower in New York on an industrial tower across the street from its former site.

The mural Haas has planned for the Williams College Museum of Art will most probably combine realistic and fantastic manipulations of architecture. Work on Haas' mural began on February 23 and will be completed in three weeks. Haas was present at the museum today and yesterday to supervise his assistants' painting of the mural he designed. He will return to Williamstown on March 18 to deliver a public lecture after its completion, and the mural itself is scheduled to remain on view until next fall.

The public is invited to view the mural-in-progess daily during the museum's regular hours. Readers of the Record are invited to peruse next week's article on mural-in-progress designer Richard Haas.

changing moods of the composition — from quiet meditation to stormy torrents of sound from the entire range of the keyboard.

Greene reserved his most inspired playing of the evening, however, for Lee Hoiby's Narrative for Solo Piano Op. 41, which was probably the least familiar of the pieces on the program. Written by a modern American composer, it is only moderately dissonant, while drawing heavily on the Romantic tradition.

Technical fireworks

Chopin's Polonaise-Fantaisie and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 12 followed. In both pieces, Greene once again showed his capacity for virtuosity as well as delicate simplicity. The Polonaise-Fanataisie is a loosely constructed, improvisational piece, in which melodies appear and fade without development, yet Greene's keen sense of rhythm established its unity without sacrificing imagination and spontaneity.

The Hungarian Rhapsody — always a crowd-pleaser — confirmed Greene's skill and power. Its dazzling technical fireworks demand a solid technique, which Greene effortlessly surpassed. In the rest of the concert, however, he revealed the imaginative interpretation and emotional depth that are even more important in determining a great pianist.

Contract major increases in popularity

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Sixteen members of the Class of 1989 applied for contract majors, seven more than applied last year, according to Assistant Dean Joan Edwards.

Nine of this year's proposals were for majors in Asian Studies. As a result of student interest in this area, the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) is considering a proposal for a major in Asian Studies.

Edwards said of the increase, "Some of the proposals are standard, while others are more interesting. We have people applying for International and Environmental Studies, History and Literature and Russian and Eastern European Studies."

No limit

Edwards pointed out that although the course bulletin refers to a possible need to limit the number of contract majors, no limit exists.

She said, "A lot of it depends on the quality of the proposal, how well thought out it is, if it's educationally sound and the strength of faculty support."

Edwards said contract majors are specifically for students who "have an idea about an interdisciplinary study that they want to take which just can't be fulfilled through a regular major or program. It's for people who really need it."

Such a major would alleviate the workload for faculty sponsors and the CEP. Each contract major must be sponsored by two faculty members, each from different departments, and must be approved by the CEP.

Asian Studies major

The CEP examined the possibility of an Asian Studies major at its meeting last Monday. The new department would be chaired by Professor of History Peter Frost, and the major would require 11 courses instead of the normal nine because of the interdisciplinary nature of the major.

Requirements would include an introductory course in development economics, anthropology or religion, four semesters

Reed projects tuition hike

by Scott Blasdell

College Treasurer William Reed said that tuition will increase again this year.

He said he was unable to pinpoint the size of the increase, which will be determined by the Board of Trustees at their April 9 meeting. The current price of tuition, room and board is $14,538 a year.

Reed cited salary increases, new programs and increased operating costs as the main causes of upward pressure on the budget.

He said that although funding for the construction of Chandler gymnasium is being provided by gifts to the college, the gym's operating costs will come from tuition payments. Reed estimates that the gymnasium's electricity bill will be $200,000 per year after its opens next September.

Tuition apparently will not be raised to make up for money lost from federal student loan cuts. According to Paul Boyer, assistant director of financial aid, the college financial aid program will not be affected by the cuts, although some students may no longer qualify for the loans. The school will not replace any money students may lose, Boyer said.

The Williams-Mystic Program offers you a challenging opportunity to focus one semester of your studies on our relationship with the sea. While living in cooperative houses at Mystic Seaport Museum, you can cross its outstanding maritime collections and library, well-equipped marine laboratory, and diverse coastal environment. You take four Williams College courses in history, literature, oceanography or marine ecology, and marine policy. You can also develop new maritime skills under professional instruction, including boat building, maintenance, sailing and celestial navigation. You spend ten days offshore on the schooner R. S. Westward, undertaking research and gaining experience on board a large, sailing vessel. The incomparable facilities of the Museum, Mystic's varied marine habitat, and the companionship of fellow students interested in the sea provide an exceptional setting for maritime studies.

Unfortunately, the officials decided to award the stall point, sending the match into overtime. After OT, the match score stood at 1-1, but Duff lost on criteria because he had been flagged for a stall in OT as well.

The sophomore's record stands at 12-2, and if he manages to win the Division III Nationals next week at Buffalo, he will be invited to the Division I Championships to compete against wrestlers from powerhouses like Iowa, Oklahoma and Iowa State.

Dan MacDonnell has been recipient of hard luck all season long. A string of injuries and problems making the 177 weight class caused him to be seeded only fifth despite his status as a two-time all-New England wrestler. In the double-elimination tourney, MacDonnell actually beat the wrestler from the Coast Guard who later knocked him out of the winners bracket in a tight semifinal match. The senior rebounded to take third, earning his third conservative All-New England award and ending his season at 10-4.

Freshman Steve Felix has to be considered the symbol of Williams' wrestling future. The 126-pounder entered the tourney seeded only sixth, but won four matches along the way to taking fourth, gaining second-team All-New England honors. Felix ends the year at 12-4.

The Ephs finished the year 3-12 in dual meets, but had two impressive tournament showings. With only MacDonnell and co-captain Andy Anselmi '87 leaving the varsity, the squad looks to an even better year in 1988 along with a continued domination of Amherst.

before Spring Break, but Wagner said that deadline probably would not be met.

Jenks stressed that the administration "does not want to do something that students don't want." He said all students will be made aware of the subcommittee's recommendations.

Wagner said that student input will come from student members of the CUL and the subcommittee. He added that on March 5 there will be an open meeting to "get students attitudes about security."

Fowler said the committee is also considering installing outdoor phones for security and looking at campus lighting, especially new exterior lighting for Greylock. He said "lights there are just useless really. They are targets for snowballs — we are constantly replacing those globes."

College Council subcommittee

College Council is also looking at campus security. A College Council subcommittee, headed by Anne Shulman '88, has met with Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Director of Security Ransom Jenks to discuss student's concerns about security on campus, especially the need for increased lighting, questions about the escort service, and security lagtime.

The council will be sending out an informational letter next week to clear up some common misconceptions about security on campus, Shulman said.

In a related development, Jenks said about increasing security measures at Driscoll after recent break-ins "I don't know that we are planning anything at this point. We're not planning to put a full time guard on duty there. If I was planning anything, I'm not sure I'd want to tell you."

Jenks said that Driscoll was "a real mess to walk into Saturday morning- people had spread eggs and ice cream all over the kitchen."

where they are. Why should the fact that a woman has a child deprive her of the opportunity to become self-sufficient? AFDC should be modeled on education and training rather than subsistence. It should stress placement in jobs and adequate day care."

Norton said that the nation needs an education system that prepares teenagers for family life, particularly emphasizing the use of birth control.

"We should seek to cut in half the number of teenage pregnancy within the next ten years. And I think this is a realistic goal," she said.

In a question and answer period following the lecture, several people challenged Norton's focus on teenage pregnancy and single motherhood. They said that these were symptoms of a larger problem rather than the problem itself.

Bolin Fellow Wahneema Lubiano questioned Norton's stress on the singleness and youth of the mothers rather than the poverty that they live in as responsible for this problem. While Norton acknowledged that there were many causes of the problem, she reiterated that single young mothers do not make for an adequate family structure.

Finally, she called on the black community and black politicians and office holders to lead and use their resources to turn the problem around. "We must teach the enduring values that form the central core of the black heritage: hard work, education and the respect for family."

Africa?' "

No separate discussion was held for Caterpillar because, according to Wood, "The proposal is exactly the same and the issues are the same."

According to Wood, the college holds stock in 35 companies which have operations in South Africa. Five of these have already announced that they will withdraw their South African operations.

At the end of last summer, 13 percent of the college endowment was invested in companies with operations in South Africa. Since then, the endowment has risen, but only eight percent of the endowment is now invested in such companies.

The ACSR supported a shareholder resolution last month calling on the Black & Decker Corp. to withdraw its South African operations. The Finance Committee approved the resolution. Reed has said that the Finance Committee has never opposed a recommendation of the ACSR.

No students attended the open meeting, and only five ACSR members were present. The next meeting is scheduled for Wednesday, March 11 at 7:30 p.m. According to Wood, the ACSR still has to vote on about 25 more proxies.

Racism

which I could not venture because my skin was not light enough; there were other parts of town that I did not approach because my skin was not dark enough. I was an adolescent brown racist myself — I had become so full of anger and bitterness that I hated, on sight alone, anybody who was white. I do not think about that part of my childhood very often and I am very grateful that I have been purged of the hurt and hate — but what I hear and see today at Williams is frighteningly familiar...

Let there be no mistake about my condemnation of racism — all forms of it perpetrated by all people whatever their color are evil. I do not attempt to argue that there are no instances of racial prejudice at Williams. I have not (yet) been a direct victim of it but I do not find it hard to believe that it exists on the Williams campus. We live in a community that is remarkably good at pushing such issues into the recesses of our collective consciousness and so it may not be obvious, except to the victim and victimizer, that this evil exists in our midst.

In the last few weeks, however, even the most uninformed of us have been exposed to a public display of a mixture of hurt, frustration, rage and, I maintain, racial prejudice, coming from, ironically, the members of the Black Student Union, acting individually and collectively.

I refer to such statements as the ones that Averll Clarke made in an Op-Ed piece in the January 13th issue of the Record: "My purpose is not to engage in an argument with any white students about something he or she can know nothing about: namely, black life at Williams .... I can only say that as white students, you are fortunate that your survival and success at Williams does not depend on your knowledge of me because most of you would not be here."

These are bitter, hate-filled words, no doubt a product of a legitimate grievance, but they are words that condemn, wholesale, anybody who is white, simply because he or she is white. Again, consider the letter we received from the BSU, a letter that registered grievances and put forward a plan of action but did so in such a manner of self-righteous rage that it was difficult not to see the letter more as an ultimatum of some kind and less as a call for rational and sensitive understanding.

Let me make it plain once more that I am not suggesting that the voices condemning racial prejudice fall silent — on the contrary they must be redoubled. They must not be the voices of contempt, hate, and violence, however.

I was "purged of the hurt and hate" that I wrote of earlier, as I entered into a relationship with God, through Jesus Christ. I wish and indeed, I pray that others in my situation might find that peace. To all the members of our community, however, I make this plea: let us examine ourselves and our actions and attitudes to find out if we are inflicting pain and injustice on others; let us all recognize that none of us is completely faultless and let us approach this problem with the knowledge that we are first and foremost members, together, of humanity and of this community.

It is cooperation and not confrontation that is the answer.

Major

of either Japanese or Chinese, five content courses to be chosen from a broad variety of departments and a senior seminar course.

Members of the CEP expressed concern over both the structure of the major and the timing of the proposal. CEP member Tom Perkins '87 said, "I know we have a problem with the number of contract majors but this seems awfully rushed."

"Cast a broad net"

Associate Professor of Sociology Robert Jackall questioned the requirement of a religion, anthropology or economics course. He said, "I understand what they're trying to do by trying to cast a very broad net. That way they can attract people from many different routes. It might make more sense for them to develop their own concentration course, though."

Assistant Professor of English Stephen Tifft pointed out that "someone could take all of these courses in Chinese and Japanese. I wouldn't imagine that many would do that but then all but two of their courses would be in languages. This major is billed as Asian Studies and implies that it is interdisciplinary. I think there would be pedagogical problems with seniors very ill-prepared to take 401."

Assistant Professor of German Gail Newman agreed and commented, "There's a case to made for saying that you should have to take some culture and literature courses."

When asked about the CEP's problems with the Asian Studies major, Frost indicated that the main difficulty was with the wording of the proposal. He said, "The wording of the 401 course has been changed so that it is more responsive to individual student's needs."

Frost said he was not concerned about the prospect of students concentrating most of their studies in language courses. He said, "I don't have any difficulty with that particular problem. That's the point of a program like this, to have students study in depth in the languages of an area."

Frost said that he was not surprised by the number of students who want to major in Asian Studies. He said, "It seems logical now that we have second-year language courses. It is an inevitable outgrowth of strong language programs. We've been talking about this for a while."

Hopkins Forest is valued by countless area residents for the beauty and rural serenity of its environment. Proposed construction would seriously impinge on the enjoyment of these elements, particularly in the entrance area. Greatly disturbing, as well, is the negative precedent which this proposal sets. The building would permanently deface the land for temporary relief from housing shortages, and set the example for future disregard of forest preservation.

Finally, this decision by President Oakley and the Board of Trustees represents a lack of respect, not only for our natural environment, but for the students and community members whose opinions were never given consideration.

As students whose college academic experiences have been complemented by the enjoyment of Hopkins Forest, we urge all those who share our concerns to voice their views to the President and the Board of Trustees. Remember, if we do not do something now, it will be too late. Destruction of a forest is irreversible.

The trees have not yet been cut.

The Purple Druids

Alienated

To the Editor:

As freshmen we would like to respond to the letter distributed by the BSU two weeks ago. Although the letter achieved its purpose — to inform the Williams community of the racial tension that exists on campus — its tone and format were counterproductive. The hostile tone of the letter served to turn away the support necessary to solve the presented problems rather than enlisting it.

Many of the accusations were presented as sweeping generalizations which were unsupported by specific evidence. These aspects of the letter have left many students feeling angry and defensive as evidenced by the past Record.

The letter demanded that immediate actions be taken to correct these problems, yet no solutions for students were proposed, nor have they been since publication of the letter. We are left feeling helpless with no way to counter accusations of racial intolerance and inaction because we don't know what steps need to be taken. This is due largely to the fact that much of the information which supports the claims of the BSU has been withheld from non-members. The request for evidence is in no way a denial that the problems exist, but rather is necessary to formulate rational opinions on which to base actions.

The BSU has indicated through the distribution of the letter that it would like the support of the Williams Community in recognizing and dealing with racial problems. We would like to suggest that in the future, the BSU provide an avenue through which students can work with it rather than alienating them from it.

physical plant, quoted in Berkshire Eagle).

At the same time, according to College Treasurer Will Reed, at least some of the impetus for developing the lots comes from the desire to provide housing and the accompanying investment opportunity to "new senior appointments people", a somewhat different category from faculty who cannot afford housing. Whatever the case, it seems as though the College community at least deserves to know to what end the College is sacrificing 25 acres of Hopkins Forest. Who would most likely get the houses? It remains uncertain as, meanwhile, the point system used to decide upon candidates for college-supported housing is being revised.

Without knowing more about the Pine Cobble project, without knowing for whom the houses are so urgently needed, without having ascertained whether it really is necessary to develop Hopkins Forest, it seems strange that we are all ready to watch development just go ahead.

Swimmers dominate Divs. II & III at New Englands meet

by Kurt Oeler

Chris Kirwan '87 and Rob Benson '90 led Williams to a second-place position at last weekend's New England's Swimming Championship Meet. The Ephmen trailed the University of Massachusetts 610-582.5 after two-thirds of the three-day meet held at Springfield College.

The Minutemen gained momentum early with strong scoring in diving and the 500 freestyle. Injuries and subpar morning preliminary swims slowed Williams, but Scott Robinson '87 and Dan Snyder '90 established school marks Friday night with seventh and thirteenth-place finishes. The senior recorded the meet's second-fastest time in a varsity record 4:40.37, while Snyder's 4:43.35 was fourth-best, erasing Robinson's 1984 freshman standard.

Kirwan and Benson counterattacked in the 200 IM with fourth and fifth-place times respectively thereby earning national championship meet berths. Five Ephs placed in the event's top 14 positions. Chris Cleurzo '90, Evan Davis '89, Jim Jordan '87 and Dave Brown '89 ended the night with a runnerup finish in the 400 medley relay, but UMass still led, 301-230.

Williams dominated the second day's scoring. Benson and Kirwan opened with crushing 400 IM swims as the freshman standout won in 4:09.05 as Kirwan took third. Cieurzo joined his classmate with a victory in the 100 fly.

Robinson's fourth in the 200 free led another four man Eph scoring rush, as he was followed by Snyder, Dean Pomerleau '87 and Mike O'Malley '89 in the top 15. Robinson's time of 1:41.79 in the prelims rewrote his own varsity standard. Davis earned his first school record with a second-place in the 100 breast, as his 59.69 nipped fellow national qualifier Scott Healy '88, who was fourth.

Beau Everett '87 added to Saturday's strong swims in the 200 IM with a seventh in the 100 back, two places ahead of Cieurzo. Pomerleau, Kirwan, Benson and Snyder captured valuable relay points with a second-place finish in the 800 free relay. Though Williams closed ground, UMass still commanded a 27.5 point lead. The Ephs easily dominated all of their Division II and III rivals.

Williams strong showing left Coach Carl Samuelson's troops in a hopeful mood for Sunday's final day of competition. Two championships, four records and eight national qualifiers prompted Healy to call the meet, "The best one we've had since I've been at Williams." Several others neared the national standard as the competition entered the final day attract more women and minority faculty to the college." Proposed expansion of divisions — "We're opposed to this new change. We feel that a good value of a liberal arts experience is to have the responsibility of constructing your own broad educational experience."

• The proposals to increase campus security, including putting lock systems on certain buildings

CHESTNUT/YEROULANOS: "I think that it's a good idea for the time, because I think there's enough fear or uncomfortableness going around that it might ease some of the tension."

KANE/HARRIS: "It's really a question of doing what the students think would make Williams College a better place. Locking the doors, I think, is going to be pretty controversial. . .Student opinion is the overriding factor."

SCHIMKE/APRIL: "There are definite problems arising from lack of tight security, and certainly tight security would cause other problems, and deciding which is more important is a big question which needs to be brought to the public."

SHULMAN/ACKERLY: The proposed system of building locks opened by student I.D.'s "means that any student could get into any building at any time. . .It's increasing security from the point of view that some random person that isn't a member of the college community can't get in. .

ZINN/MELCHER: "One of the values of coming here to get an education is the freedom of being able to go anywhere you want at anytime. Putting locks on residential halls and entries would pose a major impediment to this freedom and take a lot of the fun out of being here."

• How College Council could make Williams more attractive to prospective minority students

CHESTNUT/YEROULANOS: "Try to get a black counselor into counseling services. If the college really wants someone, they have the power, they have the finances, they have the influence to get someone."

KANE/HARRIS: "That's really something that I don't know how qualified we as non-minorities are to speak on. . . .I would really just turn for advice to the BSU and to the Asian Link and to the other minority organizations, to see what they want done to Williams College to make it better."

SCHIMKE/APRIL: "What the council can do in general is simply to get involved in the other activities that are going on on campus to improve race relations and to encourage those groups that are particularly concerned with certain aspects of that issue to get together with the council·

SHULMAN/ACKERLY: "As we revamp the academic advising system, and this goes to CEP (the Committee on Educational Policy), I think we need to have a minority advisor."

ZINN/MELCHER: "One reason right now that minorities aren't attracted to Williams lies in part because of the lack of tenured minority faculty members. By changing the composition of the CAP we feel that that would increase the number of tenured minority faculty members which in turn would increase the appeal of Williams to minority students.

• Response to the demands listed in the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) letter

CHESTNUT/YEROULANOS: "I don't think they're at all off-base. . .A grievance committee in general would be a nice thing to have."

KANE/HARRIS: "As far as an educational program in freshman days. . .talking to the freshmen can never be a bad thing, but what do they want to have done? It has to be a more specific plan."

SCHIMKE/APRIL: "On the whole, I think that the letter was important in that it really made some concrete proposals on what should be done, and it really got a lot of people interested and woke some people up."

SHULMAN/ACKERLY: "I think we have questions, such as who would they like on the grelvance committee and what powers would they like the grievance committee to have.

ZINN/MELCHER: "We feel as though the present dialogue between the Black Student Union leadership and the campus as a whole raised the understandable anger (of members of the BSU) to a level of antagonism that is beyond what would be useful dialogue and that we should get down to a good attack on the issues that they are raising."

• How effective the 1986-1987 College Council has been

CHESTNUT/YEROULANOS: "They had ideas, they knew what they wanted to do, they got the ball rolling very quickly. They did a very good job being forceful and stating College Council's opinions."

KANE/HARRIS: "The College Council and the officers have done a good job of addressing the issues they have chosen to address. They've accomplished the goals they set for themselves. You go back and look at Amy's and Suzanne's platform in the Record last year, and you'll see that they addressed and did the issues that they talked about."

SCHIMKE/ACKERLY: "I'd say they've done a rather good job with the exception of communicating with the student body."

SHULMAN/ACKERLY: "It's easy for anybody to say, 'Things could be better, things need to be better, we'll make them better,' but I think we see how things. . .need to go in order to have a concrete and effective difference."

ZINN/MELCHER: "I think they've been very effective. One of their goals was the Berkshire Food Project, which has been overwhelmingly successful. Another one of their initiatives was to revamp the JA selection process, and their attempts seem to be considered successful."

• Why people should vote for you

CHESTNUT/YEROULANOS: "We have enough diversity between the two of us to represent a large portion of the student body. . .I (Chestnut) was secretary this year for College Council, I was always in the center of the action to know what issues were going on on campus. . .Being a JA, I've (Yeroulanos) come across a quite diverse group of people in my entry."

KANE/HARRIS: "I really think that we can paint a real picture of the concrete ways in which we want to change Williams College. . .We have the experience, but we also have the innovation.

SCHIMKE/APRIL: "The College Council sometimes tends to take itself too seriously, and that's something we'd like to get away from. With our relative inexperience, I think we could come in and get things going. We haven't been corrupted by the system yet, and I don't think we would be."

SHULMAN/ACKERLY: "The leadership will be with us, but the responsibility will be diffused with everyone. The influence will be with everyone."

ZINN/MELCHER: "We have chosen to channel our organizational and leadership energies outside of the College Council at our first years here at Williams, but we have spent a lot of time thinking about issues and talking to people about what they think about issues. Therefore, we feel as though if we enter a leadership position in College Council, we will be entering with a fresh and firm grip on what the students actually want done for them."

Women's basketball downs Wesleyan

by Drew Sawyer

The Williams women's basketball season ended with a final week of one disappointing game and one exhilirating game. By defeating Wesleyan 71-58 and losing to RPI 75-69, the Ephwomen maintained their .500 performance for the 2nd half of the season which followed their 6-0 start.

The defeat at the hands of the Engineers was a disappointing one. The flat-footed Ephs were in the game throughout but lacked the spark to take the lead. The first half was a close defensive battle. RPI changed between five different defenses during the half and managed to open up a seven-point lead. The Ephs countered with a 2-1-2 zone press that forced the turnovers that brought them back in the game by halftime.

The second half began with RPI in foul trouble and the Ephs in control. A small lead opened for the hoopsters who failed to break the game open. The successful zone press used in the first half was never utilized again. RPI climbed back into the game and tied it up at 67 by the 2:15 mark. A RPI 2-2-1 press and uncharacteristically poor foul shooting from the Eph starters allowed the Engineers to rob Williams of victory. Nancy Hedeman '89 and Missy Crouchley '89 combined for 56 points with the usual assists coming from Kim Hatch '88 and Julia Beasley '89.

The Little Three rivalry was heated in the final game of the season. In the previous meeting the Wesleyan Cardinals beat the Ephs in overtime. This time the squad was determined to avenge that loss.

The first half was very tight, and the Ephs hounded the Cardinals with a man-to-man defense. Both teams traded buckets throughout the half leaving the Ephs as two-point halftime leaders.

The second half was explosive. A tough 2-3 match-up zone for the Ephs was the key. Improved rebounding and transition buckets were the result of the defensive switch. Four hoopsters scored in double figures for Williams. Hedeman had 29, Beasley 14, Crouchley 13 and Hatch poured in 10 to go along with her 11 assists. Returning to the line-up was Megan King '90 whose Manute Bol-like defensive presence was felt with 10 blocked shots bringing her average to six per game for the year.

The Weseleyan win improved the final record of the netters to 14-8 and with all starters returning next year, optimism is the dominating mentality for the season.

Runners compete at Div. I

by Steve Brody

The Williams track team sent top men and women to the NCAA Division I New England Regionals this weekend, with the men competing at Bates College and the women at Boston University. The top competition provided in Division I brought forth excellent performances, as two Williams records fell.

Two members of the men's team, Andre Lopez '87 and Geoffrey Igharo '90, competed at Bates. Lopez was not intimidated by the tough field in the 500 meters. Rather, he responded to it with a fifth-place finish in 1:05.77. Lopez was in contention for the lead through the entire race, finishing only 1.5 seconds behind race-winner Bill Oliverson of the University of Connecticut, and 1/100th of a second out of fourth. Lopez is one of the favorities in next weekend's East Coast Athletic Conference championships, also at Bates. Igharo competed in the triple jump and made the finals with a leap of 45'10". However, the freshman aggravated a hamstring injury that had plagued him earlier in the season and was unable to compete in the finals.

The women's team responded to the competition similarly to Lopez. Dawn Macauley '89 represented the Ephs in the 400 meters. She posted a time of 59.60 to set a Williams record. However, she missed qualifying for the finals in the event by one place, as the top eight advanced. Also competing was the 4X800 meter relay team of Becky Conklin '87, Sara St. Antoine '88, Anne Knott '88 and Susan Gray '90. The four ran 9:32.29 to break their own Williams record, set earlier this season, by 13 seconds. In addition, the time gave them a sixth-place finish, scoring a point in the meet. "Our goal for the race was to run under 9:40 and to score a point," said distance coach Peter Farwell, "so we accomplished both. All four (in the relay) ran good races."

Williams will be sending a larger contingent to the ECAC meet next weekend.

From The Locker Room

by Al Mottur and Stewart Verdery

The NCAA death penalty has its first victim: the Southern Methodist University's football program. SMU boosters have admitted paying 13 players $61,000, violations which brought the death penalty rule into effect.

Sanctions issued previously to outlaw programs like Clemson's football team and Wichita State's basketball squad look minor when compared to SMU's: cancellation of the 1987 season; no home games in 1988; no TV or bowls until 1989; no scholarships in 1987 and only 15 in 1988; and no on-campus recruiting until 1988.

These penalties will not only destroy the SMU football program but will seriously disrupt the school's entire athletic system, as the football team provides one-third of the athletic budget.

There is no doubt that SMU has been the ultimate bandit program, having been on probation every year since 1974 except 1977-1980 for violations involving ticket scalping, recruiting errors and payments to players and their families. However, some big names in college athletics, including Arkansas Athletic Director Frank Broyles, critized the penalties because they "are a signal to the rest of the (NCAA's) members that nothing can be gained by cooperation with the NCAA and (that) it would be best for a member to stonewall any investigation."

Broyles' displeasure is understandable in that Arkansas is in the same conference as SMU and must revamp its schedule as well as cope with the embarassment of being a fellow member of the Southwest Conference. With almost every team in the SWC on assorted probations, the SMU penalties are seen by some as a strike at the conference as a whole.

If so, good. The NCAA has finally put its foot down, and while its focus may be unfairly directed on only one program, it has to start somewhere and SMU is an obvious target. Despite the problems that exist in shutting down a bigtime team like the Mustangs, such action is warranted and necessary.

People think that college athletics are nothing more than cocaine deaths, slush-fund payoffs, and 470 SAT scores. However, for every Len Bias or SMU, there are many student-athletes and programs that manage just fine without crossing the NCAA line. There is no reason that the phrase student-athlete should become obsolete in order to reach the Top 20.

SMU has proved itself unable to control its athletic department, and for this reason, it should be made to re-examine its priorities. Finally last fall, the university's faculty senate voted to abolish "quasi-professional athletics," because SMU is a distingulshed university and should not be forced to bear the humiliating stigma that its football team has provided it.

The NCAA must continue to crack down on schools that have exhibited widespread violations, instead of suspending Steve Alford for posing for free for a non-profit calender for the girl scouts. They have made a good step in hitting SMU, a program which ignored four previous probations en route to becomming the first school to ever have their football team suspended by the NCAA.

ECAC bid awarded to hoops

by Stewart Verdery

In what could have been the last varsity basketball game to be played in Lasell Gymnasium and the last game for the four Eph seniors, visiting Wesleyan fell victim to a freshman-led Williams basketball team determined to extend their season. Point guard Garcia Major '90 took control of the game as only a dominating floor leader can, scoring 17 points in the first half, as Williams blew out the Cardinals 74-62.

The win sewed up a long-awaited East Coast Athletic Conference playoff bid, the team's first since 1979. The fourth-seeded Ephs will host the fifth-seeded Babson Beavers Saturday night at 7:30 in the first home ECAC playoff game in Williams history. A victory would send Williams to a probable semifinal conflict with ... first-seeded Amherst.

The invitation was in large part due to the Ephs' performance against a very difficult schedule that saw Williams play nine of their 21 games against NCAA or ECAC invitees. Coach Harry Sheehy was ecstatic about the bid, saying that it recognizes Williams as "one of the premier programs in New England."

Captain and power forward Greg Lang '87 kisses one off the glass in the Ephs' 74-62 destruction of Wesleyan in the last regular-season game to be played in Lasell Gymnasium. (LeBauer)

Wesleyan crunched early

Against Wesleyan, Major sparked a 20-1 Eph run with 10 points that erased an early Cardinal 10-7 lead. Of the freshman, Sheehy said, "He just took over the game." Two Wesleyan timeouts were useless, and the Ephs took a 27-11 advantage that was never cut under 10. Major hit 3-4 three-point attempts, and backcourt partner Henry Jones '88 (16 points) threw in two treys as well. Peter Alberding poured in 11 points to keep Wesleyan close, but the Ephs led at the half 41-27.

In the second half, Brandt Johnson '87, fifth in the nation in rebounding at 13.5 rpg, worked the lane for 11 points in the last regular season game of his distinguished Eph career. Major was held to two acrobatic second-half buckets, one coming on a bank-spin prayer after he was tied up on the way up.

The contest was never in doubt in the second frame, and the icing on the cake was provided by two swished free throws at 0:00 by Dave Paulsen '87. The senior wingman has seen little action in his final season, but remains a crowd favorite. The lefthander now will be to tell his grandchildren that he was the last person to score in regular season varsity action at Lasell Gymnasium.

The finale also saw standing ovations given to each of the four Eph seniors: Paulsen, Johnson, John Ciulla and captain Greg Lang. The team has won three Little Three titles, 51 games and the ECAC berth in the four years since this quartet and Coach Sheehy arrived at Williams.

Last Tuesday, the Ephmen were soundly beaten by Clark 87-76. The NCAA invitee upped their record to 22-2.

Basketball coach Harry Sheehy exults in his squad's pounding of the Cardinals on Saturday as he performs the honors of cutting down the net. (LeBauer)

Wrestlers take ninth as Duff places second

by Marc McDermott

Nothing indicates how good a wrestling team is as accurately as a tournament, and the Williams wrestling squad showed just how much it has improved with an impressive ninth-place finish in last weekend's New England's Championships.

Williams had three grapplers place in the thirteen-team event: Mark Duff '89 second at 190 pounds, captain Dan McDonnell '87 third at 177 and freshman Steve Felix fourth at 126.

Duff, seeded fourth entering the tourney, earned New England's only wild card bid to the Division III Nationals, partly due to the controversial nature of his championship match. Duff led 4-3 in the closing seconds when a referee apparently decided that Duff was stalling. Time ran out before the official made the call, and it appeared Duff was the New England champ.

Seniors star in hockey's 5-4 loss

by Al Mottur

Tuesday night in Salem Mass., the men's hockey team had a bonafide opportunity to provide head coach Bill McCormick with his 300th career win, leading Salem St. 4-3 entering the third period. However, as has been the case for the 7-13-2 Ephs for much of the year, the squad faltered in the third period and fell to its talented opponents by a 5-4 score.

Despite the loss, the game was an excellent conclusion for several Eph seniors playing their last Williams hockey game. In the first period, the Ephmen ran up a 2-0 lead as senior linemates Chris Traggio and Craig Chevers each scored once. Keeping Salem St. off the scoreboard was goalie Rick Dietz '87 who stifled all 12 of the opponents' first-period shots.

In the second stanza, the Ephs found themselves challenged for the first time as Salem St. pulled to within 4-3. Senior Denny Wright (assists from Traggio and Taylor Watts '87) and freshman Dave Bakken, set up by Mike O'Connell '87 and Ron Van Belle '90, provided the two Eph goals to keep the squad in the lead.

However, those goals were the last Williams tallies of the year, whereas Salem St. found Eph twine twice in the third period to cap the impressive come-from-behind victory. Coach McCormick was not overly dismayed by the loss to the fourth-ranked team in New England because, as he said, "We played one of our better games of the year against an excellent team, and everyone dug down deep. The seniors really came through in their final game." He said that the Salem St. comeback was fueled by Eph penalties which "disrupted our ability to play with consistency."

Next week the Record will contain a recap of the team's season.

Cloppse achieves top-twelve ranking

by Marc McDermott

Led by captain Amy Barstad '87 and number-one player Jeanne Cloppse '88, the women's squash team ended the season on a positive note at last weekend's nationals at Harvard.

Cloppse won her first two matches to advance to the third round of the 64-player tournament before losing in four games to one of Harvard's top-ranked players. She went on to win her first consolation match in straight games and took the first two games of her semifinal bout before dropping three straight to lose the match. Her performance left her ranked in the top twelve in the nation for the second straight year.

Barstad had trouble getting untracked, as she lost her first round match in straight games, but then found her stroke and plowed through her next three opponents to advance to the lower consolation semifinals. There she ran into Smith's first-ranked player, Sue Mears, who had just beaten Williams' number-two player Allison Buckner '89 in four games. After dropping the first two games 20-18 and 15-7, Barstad dug in her heels and staged a stunning comeback, winning the next three games 15-7, 15-12 and 15-12, to qualify for the finals. Although she lost to Harvard's sixth player in four games, she came away with a second-place consolation finish and a silver trophy.

Sophomores Buckner and Judy Kellog, Williams' number-four player, also played well, although they came away with little to show for it. Buckner got knocked out of the winners' bracket due to a first round loss to Harvard's Jenny Holleran. She then fought back with two easy consolation wins before losing to Mears of Smith in a match which had two games go to tiebreakers. Had she won, she would have played teammate Barstad in the semifinals.

Coach Renzie Lamb had nothing but praise for the Eph-women raquetteers: "I'm proud of Amy. It was a real gutty performance to fight back through the consolations like she did. That, along with Jeanne being ranked again, made for an excellent end to an excellent season."

Lamb was not overstating the facts as the Ephs did indeed play well, ending up 14-8 while playing a tough schedule. High points of the year included a third-place ranking in Division III and a ninth-place billing in all divisions. Since the team is losing only two players, Barstad and Gigi Madore '87, to graduation, the team should improve in the future.

SAC implements central party fund

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The Student Activities Committee (SAC) is implementing a proposal for a central party fund to be used by upperclass houses in order to cover expenses for all-campus parties.

Each student who wishes to participate will contribute five dollars to the fund through a house liaison appointed by the SAC.

SAC President Hans Humes '87 said that the party fund proposal "made a lot more sense coming from students than from the administration. It's our social life."

The SAC liaison committee, which includes liaisons appointed to each upperclass house, met yesterday to discuss the scheduling of parties and to set a deadline for the collection of money from individual houses.

Two parties scheduled

Two parties have been tentatively scheduled for this weekend, one in Tyler and the other in Mission Park.

Humes said that the proposal, made by SAC to house presidents at a Housing Committee meeting, has already been approved by individual houses and "we already have 100 percent participation from some houses" in the form of contributions to the party fund.

"This plan will be in effect within three weeks of conception," Humes said.

"We've done something"

"Unless there's a legal objection, I think this plan should work," Humes said. "At least we've done something. This is not a high priority for the dean's office. They're worried about houses in Hopkins Forest and Oakley's concerned about making this place a little Oxford."

He emphasized the importance of student participation and planning and said, "This was planned out by a student committee that is running very efficiently."

Assistant Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta, said that, while the proposal will probably be implemented quickly, the Dean's Office still has not seen a copy of it.

Question of legality

She said, "We want a lawyer to see it .... I hope they did check out legal questions. I don't think this removes liability from the SAC, and no matter what we'd do we'd probably get sued."

"Whenever there's litigation people look for the deepest pockets," Kenyatta said. "There's nothing we can do to protect ourselves short of having a dry campus, but that would just put us in an adversarial position with the students."

Kenyatta said that when the party fund proposal first came before the Housing Committee it was presented as "a feasibility study to see if the houses would buy it."

Deans plan similar fund

A similar entertainment fund that would also include smaller house parties is being planned by the dean's office and will probably be announced before spring break, she said.

Funding for the account is still undecided, Kenyatta said. "It may go somewhere on term bills," she said. This entertainment fund would also cover all of the non-alcohol costs of parties.

When asked about the parties tentatively scheduled for this weekend, Kenyatta said that she had not been aware of them, but, "If they follow regular procedures and file party plans and other things like that, there shouldn't be any problems."

When the SAC proposal was first made, Kenyatta said she suggested that money from the fund be specifically allocated for alternative beverages as well as for any alcohol that would be served.

Oakley cancels plan to build in Hopkins Forest

by Debbie Snyder

College President Francis Oakley announced in a letter to members of the faculty and administration yesterday that plans to develop six lots in Hopkins Forest for faculty housing have been cancelled.

"After careful consideration I conclude that the possible advantages of timing involved do not outweigh the obvious disadvantages of intruding on the Forest," the letter said.

Oakley and College Treasurer William Reed noted that this decision does not preclude future development in Hopkins Forest. They said, however, that if any such development were to occur, it would not be until the next century.

"I feel very happy," said professor Henry Art, director of the forest. He said he learned of the decision Monday from another faculty member who had just received Oakley's letter.

"I'm pleased for the Forest and I'm pleased that the president was able to reach a very difficult decision," Art said. "The easy thing would have been to have gone ahead and developed it."

The decision not to develop came after Reed met with members of the faculty and administration to discuss the plans for development.

Reed said the conflict was between an urgent need for faculty housing and a desire to leave the forest intact.

Reed said that pressure on the college to provide housing seemed to be outweighed by pressure, particularly from members of the Center for Environmental Studies, to preserve the forest.

"The pressure (to provide faculty housing) was not quite as intense as this thing dragged on," he said.

The administration had originally described the development of the lots in Hopkins Forest as a stopgap measure for the time until the recently purchased land on Pine Cobble is ready for sale to faculty.

The land on Pine Cobble will take longer to develop, because no sewage or water systems exist there yet, administrators said. The lots in the forest would have been connected to already existing systems used by the Forest Road development accross the street.

"The hope is that we can get Pine Cobble ready sooner than we thought," Reed said.

Admissions, BSU host minority prospectives

by Peter Balaban

As part of its effort to attract more minority students to Williams, the Admissions Committee invited a small group of black students from three public high schools in New York City to Williams last week as prospective freshman.

The students, who came from the Bronx High School of Science, Clara Barton High School and A. Phillip Randolph High School, were hosted by members of the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU).

Each year the college holds special weekends for minority prospectives to see Williams.

Assistant Director of Admissions Jo Ann Gray-Murray, who arranged this recruiting weekend, said that the college usually likes to invite students who have never seen Williams before and have not had an interview yet. She said the visit was not a guarantee of admission.

"Different from City College"

"I think we find that it is especially important for minority candidates from urban areas and public high schools who have not seen Williams to come up — Williams is a lot different from City College of New York," Gray-Murray said.

Philip Smith, director of admissions, said that last week the college played host to about 15 black students. He said that the main goal of the Admissions Office is to "make sure they have a chance to interface with other students."

He said that he had talked to some of the students who had participated in the weekend and they all said they had a good time. "That's the bottom line," Smith said.

Assistant Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta said "BSU members play a very important role in recruitment. If they are excited and upbeat then they can really help the candidates about feeling excited and upbeat about the college."

Racial tension

Gray-Murray said the college has not changed its approach to minority recruitment in view of recent racial tensions on campus.

She said, "I think we are using the same approach we've used in the past. I'm very candid about what's going on here. They need to know what the mood is — I'm not afraid of letting them see the good and the bad."

Kenyatta said the college doesn't actively make prospective students aware of tensions on campus. "Frankly, it's not something we advertise to candidates. If they ask us we'll be honest about it."

The prospective students sat in on a WBSU meeting last Wednesday night. Gray-Murray said that she thought it was important for

Panelists discuss threat, prevention of rape

by Karen Costenbader

"There isn't one person here tonight who hasn't been affected by what happened," said Robert Scott of the Berkshire County Crime Prevention Unit at the Rape Awareness Panel held last Wednesday night.

He was speaking about the rape which reportedly took place on the Williams campus this January.

Scott was in charge of the rape investgation, which has since been put on hold. He said, "A lot of blame has been placed on the woman in this case. People think she is stubborn and not cooperating."

According to Scott, an average prosecution in a case of rape takes from nine to eleven months. He said, "I wish I could paint a really rosy picture of the criminal justice system and what we can do for you, but I can't."

He asked the audience, "How would you feel about coming back from California or wherever is home this summer to undergo a prosecution?"

The panel was made up of seven other speakers in addition to Scott. Roberta Russell of the Pittsfield Rape Crisis Center, Eliza Kent '89, president of Feminist Alliance, and John Howland of the Williams Psychological Counselling Services spoke about the lasting effects which rape has on its victims.

Rita Brown '88 spoke of the history of criminal rape in our society, and Philosophy Professor Rosemarie Tong spoke about date rape.

The panel was jointly sponsored by the College Council, the Feminist Alliance, the Health Service, the Office of the Dean, the Office of the Chaplain, Peer Health, Psychological Counselling Service, and the Women's Studies Department.

Nancy McIntire, assistant to the President, chaired the panel. A question and answer session followed the talks given by each of the panelists.

No guaranteed prevention

"There is no single guaranteed way to prevent rape," said Russell. She said that one in three women in American society is raped during her life, and that it was certain that some of the women in the audience were victims of rape.

Brown said that in early times rape was thought of as "the embezzlement of a father's just price on his daughter's virginity."

Rape, according to Brown, has been looked upon as a crime against womanhood, rather than against women. She said many lawyers are hesitant to prosecute, believing that "a woman can get a good man into a lot of trouble just by screaming rape."

Assumption of promiscuity

An assumption which is often made by our society, according to Howland, is that a woman who has been raped somehow demonstrated a conscious or unconscious promiscuity.

He said that a rape victim must for years afterward deal with, "the reality of absolutely

The Williams Record

Good move

The development of six lots for faculty homes in the southeast corner of Hopkins Forest was not a forgone conclusion, as the Record termed it in an editorial February 17. On Sunday, College President Francis Oakley said that the planned subdivision would not proceed.

We're glad we were mistaken.

This move is, ostensibly, a signal that the administration is listening to feedback from students and faculty, and is able, when persuaded by their arguments, to change direction on a major project.

As Hopkins Forest director Henry Art put it, "The administration is to be congratulated for weighing the various perspectives, rather than just saying, 'We're going to do it, and that's it.' "

The effort to find reasonable alternatives for new faculty housing goes on. As the college looks toward the 200-acre Pine Cobble site it has purchased, environmentalists must follow closely behind — keeping limits on the use of that mountain which graces the view from this valley.

Concern for the environment makes housing faculty difficult, but we must keep in mind that it is also the environment and our access to it which make Williams attractive to faculty.

Quotation of the Week

"At least we've done something. This is not a high priority for the dean's office. They're worried about houses in Hopkins Forest and Oakley's concerned about making this place a little Oxford."

—SAC president Hans Humes '87, on the implementation of the organization's new central party fund.

CIA

To the Editor:

When meeting two weeks ago with CIA representatives Thomas J. Gilligan to discuss the CIA's discriminatory hiring practices, members of the BGLU were confronted with all the justifications presented to the Williams community in last week's Record article: 'CIA interviewer defends his organization's hiring policies.' After a lengthy dialogue, the CIA spokesman discounted the premises behind the CIA's prejudicial policy those premises being: homosexuals are subjected to blackmail, the CIA cannot be accommodate operatives who are not employable in every nation, and gays have insatiable sexual appetites. Gilligan stated: "There is no counter-intelligence justification for considering homosexuals a security risk," and blamed the practice of not hiring homosexuals on a 'conservative' hiring staff.

The BGLU is affronted by the duplicity inherent in the CIA's public stance and Gilligan's statement that the CIA "considers the whole person" in hiring. Until the CIA is both honest in its public presentation and is willing to adopt hiring practices consistent with the values upheld by the College we will continue to object to its presence on campus.

Alienation

To the Editor:

"I am a rock, I am an island." — Paul Simon.

Maybe Paul is an island, but the rest of us have to live each with other, and doing so can take effort. It isn't easy for members of minority— and activist— groups to maintain their identities and pursue their goals while trying to live with the well-meaning silent majority. Life becomes even more difficult when the statements and the activities of these groups alienate the majority, damage the groups' credibility within the community, and drive away potential supporters.

Is alienation a necessary byproduct of minority activism? Can a minority/activist group keep its distinctive identity and remain faithful to its goals while striving to maintain and even promote campus solidarity?

A discussion will be held March 16 at 7:30 PM in Currier Ballroom to deal with these questions. Both activist and 'mainstream' students and faculty are encouraged to come and contribute their thoughts on this issue. In an effort to achieve a frank discussion, no one except reporters will be excluded. The fear of being quoted out of context can often inhibit the free exchange of ideas, particularly on such a sensitive topic.

The ground rules are 'leave your ego,' and, more importantly, 'what we say here stays here.' It is our intention to hold a discussion in which what one says won't be held against him or her later, to allow the true grievances of both sides to be aired, listened to and hopefully understood.

Student aid

To the Editor:

President Reagan's 1988 budget proposal includes severe cuts in student aid, of which Williams College stands to lose $600,000. These cuts are our problem — 35 percent of our student body receives some type of financial aid. The repercussions of the student aid cuts will affect not only these students but the entire student body. Tuition, which is already projected to rise by seven percent next year will have to be increased an additional three percent as the funds for aid come out of the operating budget and the costs are passed down to students. A far more debilitating result would be the loss of the need-blind admissions policy presently followed by the College; Williams would no longer be open for the most able students, but reserved for those willing and able to pay the substantial cost of private higher education.

We have to insure that the most qualified students can obtain an education commensurate with their abilities, regardless of their financial background. These cuts in aid would render education a luxury rather than a right — a possibility completely at odds with our democratic ideals.

We must insure the preservation of universal education — the one most important factor in creating a responsible, voting populace. It is up to us, as those directly affected, to voice our opinions and make the creators of this budget realize where the priorities of resource allocation should lie. We should not hesitate to make our views known by writing to our congressmen, Secretary Bennett, and President Reagan.

We are lucky to live in a free society —we should use the powers guaranteed to us as citizens of America and participants in a democracy to achieve the ideals we believe in.

Record fails in confronting presence of racism on campus

by Martin White '87

What does the word 'racism' mean? As I involve myself in the 'dialogue' on campus over the BSU's letter last week, I am struck with the casuainess with which the majority of people treat the word. The majority of them do not know. And they do not want to know. We can all agree: "Racism is bad." But what does that statement mean when most people are using a term they have never taken the time to understand? It is that very cover of ignorance which provides the defense and maneuvering ground by which a racist society can continually deny its own racism? "Where is it? Show us some evidence."

Many black students I talked to were shocked to see the Record claim that the incident which spurred the BSU's letter had nothing to do with race. Indeed, it had everything to do with race and with the kind of blind insensitivity which infects this campus and this society. As I do not wish to violate anyone's privacy I will elaborate with an appropriate analogous example.

I have a friend who experienced a number of incidents which were personally humiliating to him. It seems that some people he must associate with take particular pleasure in "poking fun" at some particularly black features of his. This friend is generally tolerant; yet there is something about the dynamic here that infuriates him. He has to smile and pretend that the remarks and actions of these people have nothing to do with race. He smiles, tells them to leave him alone, yet they are persistent. It is only a joke. Even when he tries to explain, it is no use.

What happens to the black person who experiences these kinds of "subtly" derogatory people in a society which, by its institutions and history, denies the very humanness of black people? What happens to his self-respect and confidence when he feels he must smile and play the part of fool in order to maintain the bounds of politeness which others break at his expense? Would you characterize his anger and the dynamics which caused that anger as nonracial and "discredit" the validity of his anger? You already have.

If a black student who encountered racism named names and accused a teacher of racism, would you be satisfied? I do not think so. What makes you any different than the Board of Directors of the Williamstown Youth Center who labelled the racial intolerance that Professor Lubiano's son encountered there as an "unfortunate misunderstanding." Would your first reaction, like theirs when the word racism was used in relation to their friends and community, be disbelief and skepticism? Why? And what effect do you think that that overwhelming preponderance of disbelief and skepticism would have on the individual who's only proof is their experience.

You ask for specifics which can only mean people and names. I doubt that you really want that. But even if you did, it would be insensitive and irresponsible of the BSU to publicize the names of students and teachers in a public letter like the one we sent out. Some black students are not anxious to publicize incidents in departments in which they plan to major or further enroll. Would you like to accuse a professor with tenure of racial insensitivity publicly when you were still enrolled in his class? And wouldn't it have been unfair to the staff and employees of the College if we had named them in a one-sided document which allowed them no immediate response. Your editorial was very poorly thought out.

Living it up in Paris: letters from a Williams expatriate

by David Gelobter '88

PARIS — Although it should interest a much wider audience, I've written this essay primarily so that other students considering study abroad might have a concrete idea of what they will find; I certainly didn't. Armed with a vague Romantic notion of Paris, the American students came not quite sure what to expect; we stay not quite sure of what we are getting. It has been at times traumatic and reassuring, exhilirating and depressing, different and similar, old and new, but it never stays constant. Many of us have learned more about ourselves (and the world that supports us) in the last four months than in the last four years.

I am not sure whether it is life in another language, free time, Paris or Junior Year. First, we met each other — Americans going to study in Paris. More or less friendly, we became somehow close, depending more on ourselves than those we came to immerse ourselves in. Perhaps that was our first mistake: we knew it would be strange, but none of us imagined how serious it would be that everyone around us thinking in a completely different vocabulary. Some of us, particularly those here for a semester, may never understand this: a whole country was raised having every waking thought in French. So we lived, trying to speak French to each other, transposing our American ideas and realities. Here we realized together and alone for the first time that we are Americans.

We reacted differently — some shunned the reality, others embraced it, and still others paid it no attention. We all moved on. We searched to make some sense of Paris — to find the streets, buildings, metros, and hopefully courses. The terrorist bombings, the police searches, and the new immigration laws did not simplify our task. We lost track of each other, or perhaps got too close, and the confusion began. Everything in our real-

Closing the Jeffressonian era: meatless meal, communications

by Andrew Mayer

As I pointed out last week, the College Council under outgoing President Amy Jeffress '87 made much-needed improvements in communication between the Council, the administration, and student-faculty committees. However, complaints have been still registered that the College Council has not focused enough attention on social issues, such as party policy and divestment. A closer examination of Jeffress's term proves critics wrong.

The most significant development during the past College Council term is the development of the meatless meal, and, subsequently, the Berkshire Food Project. Jeffress, Vice-president Suzanne Blemiller '87, and others convinced the administration and Food Service director James Hodgkins, who was initially against the program, to institute the monthly meatless meal. The program has been such a success that the Mission Park Dining Hall actually ran out of food during one meal.

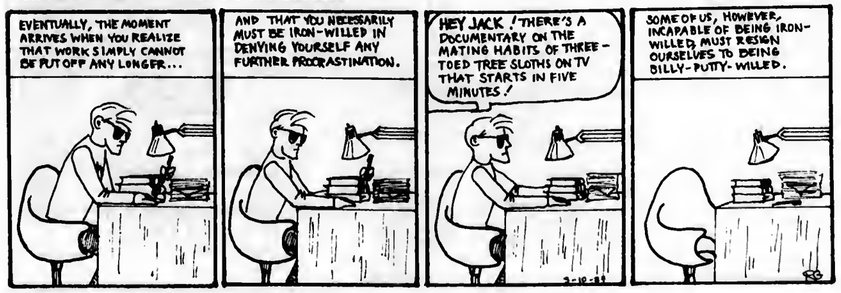
The money saved from the meatless meal funds the Berkshire Food Project. Williams students prepare and serve a free lunch in North Adams every Monday and Thursday. The Berkshire Food Project has been praised in both the North Adams Transcript and the Advocate. At a time when Williams students can sit back and ignore the hardships of the surrounding areas, the students involved, especially coordinator Cheryl Salem '87, deserve the highest praise.

Improved 'town-gown' relations have been a goal of College Council all year, exemplified by the Council's relationship with the newly-formed Town-College Liaison Committee. While the Council did not help to form the committee, the meetings have been regularly attended by Council reps Brooke Ackerly '88 and Don Dagnoli '87, who have reported back to the Council on relevant issues. Jeffress expressed hope that these meetings have increased understanding between the College and the town.

Responding to divestment, the College Council did make a serious effort last fall to hear students' opinions. When the Anti-Apartheid Coalition protested for divestment by putting crosses on Baxter lawn, the Council sponsored a panel discussion on divestment. In addition, a referendum was held to pinpoint student views.

The referendum asked students to give their opinion on policy toward College-owned stocks of companies that operate in South Africa. Students chose between policies of divestment, disinvestment advocacy, or a continuation of the old Sullivan Principle policy. Jeffress was discouraged by the results, which she termed inconclusive.

A more recent example of the Council's concern for campus life was last week's Rape Awareness Panel. The forum was sponsored by College Council and other groups and included representatives from the Counseling Services, the Pittsfield Rape Crisis Center and the Berkshire Crime Prevention Unit. It should be noted that the Council did not sit back and let someone else take the initiative.



Jeffress called the area of party policy very frustrating. She said, "To say the CC is powerless would be true, but I think that the administration is equally powerless." Critics and especially candidates for the Council offices should take note of the comment. Any decision or proposals made on party policy must be both within the context of the state law and encouraging to students. Coming up with a combination to please both the lawmakers and students is proving very difficult.

Critics and particularly candidates must remember that the College Council as a whole only has limited power, which is further dependent on the student representatives. A closer look at the issues addressed by the Council this year shows that Jeffress and Blemiller have themselves introduced most issues.

According to Jeffress and evidenced by the passing of the entire Council budget in an unheard-of 45 minutes, the student representatives have been complacent in their positions, not questioning issues, perhaps at times even rubberstamping opinions. This presents a problem for an energetic president like Jeffress.

In summary, Amy Jeffress and her administration have worked in anonymity this year, not capturing the Record headlines as have past Councils. The absence of controversy is linked with the absence of surprise on this year's Council. They have kept informed on campus issues, addressed them, and worked hard to promote them. Jeffress set her goals and then accomplished them, something rarely seen in any political position.

WHERE THE PURPLE COWS ROAM — by Rich Gardella

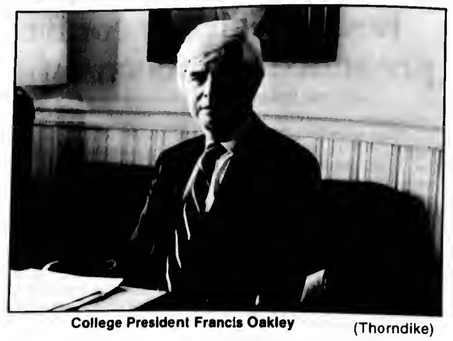
Keeping up with the President

Record editors John McDermott, Debbie Snyder and Joe Thorndike interviewed College President Francis Oakley last Wednesday about his opinions on various issues. Excerpts from the interview follow.

College Treasurer William Reed has said that tuition will have to rise again, and it just did go up last year. In the face of increasing tuition costs, will the college maintain a need-blind admissions policy?

"Yes. That's one of our major goals. It looks, and I don't think one has to be prophetic, as if the federal government is going to reduce its commitment to financial aid nationally. It would have reduced it more if it could have. So we look forward to a clearly testing challenge, and it is basically maintaining equity of access to the education we offer. After all, if we're committed to meeting demonstrated financial need, tuition increases in themselves (except for the image they project) don't interfere with that. Well that's a testing goal, that one, and that would be one of the very central things that we would be going after enhanced endowment for."

What is your opinion on tutorials? Specifically, how can they enhance the Williams education?



"I think they would add a nice, happy balance to what we already do. It would clearly enhance the intimacy of the educational scale that is part of an institution of this sort and a proud part of our heritage. We talk of Mark Hopkins and the log. What could be more in that tradition? So that's one thing. The other thing I think, having been a product of the receiving end, tutorial instruction can be good and bad. It's not privileged in any way. Tutors are capable of doing a lousy job. And I can attest to that. They're also capable of doing a very fine job. So there's nothing privileged about it. But it does do something. I think that it does a series of things, but one thing particularly I think would be valuable for us is that as component of a range of things we do. It does shift rather clearly the burden of learning onto the student and allows in some ways the student to determine the framing of a set of questions. And it puts the teacher in a somewhat different role is normally the case in our setting."

In your recent meeting at Rice House with Black Student Union (BSU) members, what did you learn?

"It was a valuable, constructive meeting. Some of the things that we heard were not fully surprising, others were things that one didn't know about relating to cases of racial tension. The depth of feeling was conveyed clearly. The sense to which, for example, students may be feeling the theat of loss of hard won ground nationally for the black American population and its impact on our own community. We (the college) have made a fairly massive commitment over the years to maintain open access, to produce a diverse student population. This has, of course, good educational grounds. It opens up the possibility for the sort of learning one hopes will go on in a residential community. I would hope students graduating from Williams will graduate not only with their talents enhanced intellectually but also with their sensitivities sharpened and their capacity for offering mature guidance and leadership in this area improved. This is a great national challenge. We should be playing our part in helping meet that challenge."

The Admissions Committee met recently with members of the Jewish Association, and something that was raised was that the Jewish center is located in the basement of the school church. Do you have plans to change that?

"Yes. I understand the inadequacy of the arrangements that currently exist .... One of the things I'd like to see in the (college's Bicentennial) fund drive is provision for a center elsewhere. That clearly has symbolic importance, apart from practical importance."

College President Francis Oakley (Thorndike)

At some point in your career, you had to have made a conscious decision to go from being a scholar to being an administrator. When did you decide to cross that line, and how do you learn to be a president?

"Let me go at it, if I may, indirectly. We are who we are. One of my formative experiences was in the British Army, not that it's an analogy for my present job, but I held very considerable responsibilities for people. Dealing with people and responsibility for them was something obviously that mattered and had some rewards. One of the very attractive features of a college of this sort for faculty members coming into it is the range of things that its possible to do in this setting. This is a very highly participatory institution. Faculty have a very big role. It's attractive to be able to take on other assignments — teaching, scholarship and some sort of governance or administrative responsibilities. I clearly derive deep satisfaction from all of those things. There is a sacrifice in taking on an administrative office. My teaching and scholarly instincts are strong. I hope to end my career doing teaching and scholarship. I don't have galactic aspirations.

Would you like to see more students go into teaching?

"Yes. We have a very good record, not always recognized. The number of our alumni in all levels of education is really very high. . .I think this is a very important need. Again, it's an area in which I would like to see our former students lead."

Waldheim disease afflicts Austrian voters, Haas says

by Susanne Abell

Why was Kurt Waldheim elected to the Austrian Presidency in the spring of 1986? How will it affect Austria's future?

These were the questions that Werner Haas, professor of german at Ohio State University, addressed last Monday in a lecture entitled "Austria before and after Waldheim".

"One year ago," he said, "a national election in Austria was hardly newsworthy, for the world or for Austria."

Before the Waldheim affair spurred foreign interest in the country, Austria evoked for many, Haas said, a country without political skeletons to hide.

This view changed last year, he said, when Kurt Waldheim decided to run for president.

There was uncertainty about his record, particularly concerning his activities in Yugoslavia during World War II. He was said to have participated in war crimes there.

Haas said, "There are conflicting stories about what he thought he did and what others say he did. This seems to indicate that there is now not only Alzheimer's disease but also a 'Waldheim disease', which manifests itself in that you forget your political past. Now the Waldheim disease has spread and nobody knows for sure what he was doing during the war."

The issue of Waldheim's ethics led in 1986 to the issue of Austrian voters' ethics, Haas said. The world wondered whether Austrian

by Paul Kwon

About five months after College Council Treasurer Alec Dawson '87 described Parallax as having "no organization whatsoever" a reorganized Parallax staff is planning to come out with its first issue of the year. The issue is expected to come out the week before spring break.

Parallax is a paper designed to present both sides of political issues or problems.

During College Council's budget meeting held last October 16, Parallax was denied funding by the College Council Finance Committee.

According to co-editor-in-chief Eric Adelstein, "The problems that we had this fall were partly due to organizational problems and miscommunication with the College Council. We submitted a proposal the previous spring and we had no idea that the budget meeting was so important. Then we let things drift for a while; then I went to Paul Mahoney, the representative on the budget committee and told him that there's enough interest in our paper."

Adelstein said that the staff will try for two issues this spring. The Finance Committee's decision on Parallax's budget request to support publication this year is still pending; the final decision is scheduled to be made during this week's College Council meeting. According to Dawson, the request is for $450.

Mahoney said that the proposal will be given fair consideration by the College Council. "I don't think that Parallax has stirred any dislike among the College Council," he said.

Reasons given for the collapse of Parallax included mismanagement and lack of student interest. Last fall during a Record interview, a former Parallax staff member accused former editor-in-chief Ed Stein '87 of blocking out articles that expressed views contrary to his own.

"The purpose of the paper is to serve as a political discussion," Adelstein said. Anything of good literary merit should be included. It's not the editor's job to decide which political perspective to put in. Also, I worked with Ed Stein last year and I didn't find any of the allegations to be true."

Adelstein spoke confidently of the paper's future, saying "I'm very committed to putting the paper back together. It's important that Williams College has a publication of political issues to stimulate discussion of these issues."

He said that he will submit a budget proposal in the spring for 1987-88.

He said that he will try to continue things where they left off last year. "We'll try to publish more

Artist Richard Haas on Wallworks

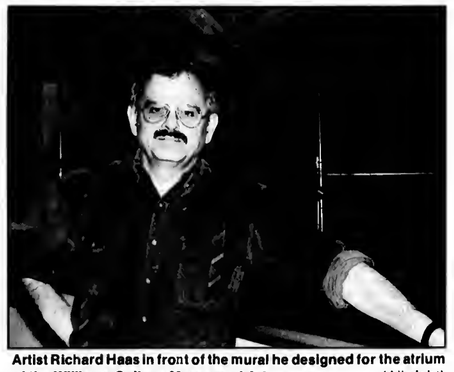
by Beth Broadrup

He didn't exactly look like a nationally acclaimed artist. Yet there he stood in the atrium of the Williams College Museum of Art, wearing a green painter's outfit, his grimy hands holding a wine glass soon drained of diet coke: Richard Haas. Haas spent two days last week supervising the execution of the Wallworks mural he designed.

The scaffolding erected next to the wall seemed to take more time to construct then for the white wall to be hidden under Haas' design. So what is the process by which the small-scale design propped up on the paint-spattered landing was transformed to a space of 850 square feet? Haas had no qualms about revealing his methods (great artists and great chefs are obviously palettes — or palates — apart in that respect).

Pouncing with charcoal

Haas and his assistants first enlarged the drawing in his New York studio and traced it on to brown paper the actual size of the atrium wall. They then "pounced" it; that is, they punctured holes along the lines of the drawing. Next, they rubbed the pounced areas with charcoal and brought the paper to the mural's site.



By pressing the paper in sections to the wall and pounding on it, the charcoal dotted outlines are transferred to the wall surface. The painters "line" the design (a sort of connect-the-dots with paint) and brush in the color. Haas noted that the brick portions of the mural were created by brushing color in between plastic cutouts, like stencilling. The wall was not primed in any way before the paint (acrylic and normal house paint) was applied.

Anyone who has seen the mural knows that it appears as an odd combination of architecture, half formally classic and half an incomplete wooden support structure. So what does that mean? First of all, it is characteristic of the way Haas' style incorporates realism and fantasy. No building really looks like this, except here on our museum wall. But on a less cerebral level, what is going on? Haas answered, "I think it's about construction."

Incomplete

The mural certainly depicts a building undergoing that process. Haas remembered the impression he got when he first saw the museum under con-

Association strives to improve Jewish life

by Michael Barsanti

The core of the Jewish community at Williams is a small and dedicated group of students, faculty and staff who are working to make the college a more comfortable place for Jews who are here now and those who are thinking about coming here. Ten percent of the people at Williams are Jewish and approximately 30 of those people participate in the Jewish Association.

Freshman Michelle Reznik, president of the Jewish Association, described it as a social, cultural and religious group. She said that the organization tries to "maintain the Jewish tradition as a community."

Breadth of services

This requires a breadth of services and activities that make the Jewish Association unique. On a strictly religious level, the group celebrates major annual holidays like Yom Kippur, Rosh Hashanah and Passover whose Seder, according to Reznik, "has always been a success." Shabbat services are held every Friday night, and are followed by a kosher dinner.

Socially, the association sponsors an Israeli Night, with Israeli food and entrtainment, several pizza and beer nights, and recently, a "Sophomore Sabbath" followed by a southern-style cookout.

Events such as Holocaust Remembrance Week and various lectures help to educate the college, and in Reznik's words, to "keep abreast of Jewish issues." While the association runs all of these events, anyone is welcome to attend them. Their activities extend beyond campus, as the group interacts with local synagogues by doing things like teaching Hebrew to children in North Adams.

Kuskin Center

Most events are held in the Kuskin Center, a large room in the basement of the chapel. This room is constantly busy, with an area for worship in one corner, a collection of books on Jewish interests in another, a lounge directly opposite the bookshelves, and a kitchen in the fourth corner.

While it is a comfortable room to use as a center, there are some problems with the facility. The thirty or so people that eat there on Friday nights must make their dinners on a small range and in a microwave oven which are too small and thus require immense amounts of work in preparation and clean up. When 60 show up for events such as the Sophomore Sabbath, this problem is exaggerated. Being in the basement of the chapel also means that services, or organ practice, upstairs can disturb the worshipers beneath. To get to the Kuskin Center, you must enter through the back door of the basement of the chapel.

Negative impression

The location of the Kuskin Center makes it very

Tufts

Questions have been raised about Tufts sophomore Ian Kremer's accusations of racism and assault on campus which were reported in this space two weeks ago. Kremer, who claims to have been attacked by three or four white men after writing about racism in a campus newspaper, is now being questioned by university police who doubt the credibility of his story. According to university police chief Gerald Kearney, three Tufts students have come forward saying that they were near the area of the alleged assault and heard nothing. Police found no disturbances in the snow where this incident was supposed to have taken place, and custodians cleaning a nearby building also heard nothing.

Kremer, who is sporting a sling and a bandage near his right eye, described his assailants as white, 5'10" to 6' tall, but was unable to provide a better description of their clothing than to say that they had the "jeans and coat look." Police said that neither the staff of the infirmary nor the hospital he was taken to advised Kremer to wear a sling (The Boston Globe).

Johns Hopkins

Johns Hopkins University President Steven Muller recently announced that tuition for the 1987-88 academic year will rise to $11,000, an increase of 7.8 percent. Muller told the Student Council that Hopkins ranks approximately 50th among American colleges in terms of costs. "There's no correlation between academic quality and cost," Muller said. When a student asked if the tuition increase would cause the university to attract students from higher income levels, Muller responded that, "Hopkins has never attracted and is not likely to attract wealthier families. We have not been a fashionable school for the social set. Our competitive academics — nerd-like atmosphere, discourages (that)."

More Hopkins

Sportswriter and announcer Howard Cosell will be one of the speakers at the Johns Hopkins commencement ceremonies this year. Members of the committee to find a speaker for the convocation address encountered several difficulties, including pressure to choose a political speaker. According to co-chairman Joseph Battaglia, however, "it's not a political forum, it's a celebration of lasting through four years of Hopkins and Baltimore." Another problem Battaglia identified was that, "the University seems to be a little bit stingy about handing out honorary degrees." According to the Hopkins News-Letter, Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor will receive such a degree, but Cosell will not.

Dartmouth

Director of the Dartmouth College Health Service John Turio and two Dartmouth students appeared on "The Donahue Show" last week to discuss the relative merits of a "safe sex" kit which was distributed on campus by the college health staff. Turbo and student Cuong Do '88 spoke in support of the kit and its accompanying brochures, while Debbie Stone '87, editor of the Dartmouth Review, said that the explicit descriptions in the brochures encouraged immoral sexual activities. "The college is sending out the message that moral considerations aren't even worth mentioning," she said.

Amherst

Many outdoor activities scheduled to take place during Amherst's Winter Carnival last month had to be cancelled. Barrel jumping, broom hockey and the human dogsled race had to be called off due to an early thaw accompanying unusally mild temperatures. The indoor skating rink was not available for events such as broom hockey because it had already been booked by the Amherst Figure Skating Club. The bonfire had to be cancelled because of an Amherst town law that prevents schools from holding more than one bonfire each school year. There was apparently a very small, very poorly attended bonfire in October, which meant that Amherst could not hold another one this year.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Record reporters Erik Burns and Anne O'Malley from material printed in other campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

Jewish Association

difficult to dispel what former faculty advisor Professor Lawrence Kaplan called "a stereotypically negative impression" in many Jewish communities about Williams. In light of this impression, he said that he is "surprised that as many come to Williams as they do."

People such as Kaplan and the student members have been trying to increase the stature of the Jewish Association on campus, and to spread news of the improvements in Jewish life in general. The Bronfman family gave Williams the money to hire a full time professor in Judaic studies, Professor Judith Wegner, three years ago. Last year, the Grossman family gave the school a new Torah that has helped the identity of the group. The admissions office now has a pamphlet, which Kaplan put together several years ago, on Jewish life at Williams.

New center

The administration has become interested in these problems of facilities and image, according to Kaplan. He said that he sees "much more of a commitment" to Jews on campus. This commitment has taken the form of a proposal for a new Jewish center. College President Francis Oakley said last Wednesday that a new center will be built. The proposed center is at least five years in the future and is linked to the 1993 bicentennial fund drive. It would be a separate building on campus which would house a kosher kitchen and give more room for various activities sponsored by the Jewish Associations.

The center would be an appropriate goal for what Justin Brasch '87, a member of the Jewish Association and a Hebrew teacher in North Adams, called a "thriving and very committed" group. The last few years have seen an increase in the influence of the Jewish Association, as seen in the number of members and events they are responsible for. The large number of freshmen on the board of the Jewish Association said that they promise that it will stay thriving, at least while they are here. Reznik summarized her experience at Williams by saying, "It's a great place to be a Jew."

overwhelming feelings, terror, inability to control her own life, and fear of death."

Howland described the rape victims he has counselled, "they get flattened and wooden, lose their vivacity and pizazz, and get wary and suspicious."

Kent, who trained this fall to become a volunteer on the Rape Crisis 24-hour hotline, said, "I realized that how prevalent it (rape) is is an indicator of a really sick society and warped views about sexuality."

Kent also spoke of the tendency for rape victims to blame themselves and therefore needed reassurance. She said, "You have to show her that she did the right thing for herself, and that she still has control."

Tong talked about date rape, the most prevalent form of rape. She listed a number of factors which she said contributed to its high incidence. These included sex role stereotypes, poor communication, mixed messages, and learned violence.

She said that there were , "certain attitudes which can reveal another side of his (potential date-rapist's) personality".

She said women should be aware of, "evidence of hostility toward women, a domineering personality, and unrealistic views of women."

Tong said she felt that knowing one's sexual rights and responsibilities was an important step to take in preventing date rape. She said, "You have the right to wear whatever you want," and that "it is fair if you change your mind at the last minute."

Guest violinist Sklar solos for Berkshire Symphony concert

by Alex Oh

The Berkshire Symphony presented its third concert of the season on Friday, March 6th, at 8:00 p.m. in Chapin Hall.

Under the direction of Julius Hegyi, the Berkshire Symphony performed Bartok's Two Pictures for Orchestra, Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E minor, Op. 64, and Dvorak's Symphoy No. 8 in G Major Op. 88.

The concert featured a young violinist by the name of Maurice Sklar on violin; the Mendelssohn's Concerto showcaed Sklar's virtuosity on violin. Sklar, who will make his New York recital debut in April, took control of the piece from the opening theme. The Allegro molto appassionato opened with Sklar's authoritative rendition of the opening theme.

Virtuosity

The orchestra provided the chorus, as both interchanged melodies, with the violin embellishing upon the orchestra's more basic melody; througout the movement, the soloist and the orchestra competed for the more beautiful interpretation of the music, both being quite successful in its own way.

The cadenza showcased Maurice Sklar's virtuosity on violin; this unique placing of the cadenza before the recapitulation by Mendelssohn provided a unique deviation from the classical concerti form. Although at times technique outshadowed musical coherence, Sklar gave an impressive and controlled performance.

Haunting performances

The Andante was simply exquisite, with haunting performances by both the orchestra and the soloist that sent Mendelssohn's lucid melodies to a new and even greater heights.

The Allegro molto vivace was somewhat disappointing after the brilliancy of the second movement. The tempo seemed almost too fast as the solo sounded hurried and unclear; the melodies throughout the movement were on the verge of hysterics. However, Maurice Sklar proved to be a virtuoso violinist with a promising future in his performance.

The Mendelssohn was preceded by Bartok's Two Pictures for Orchestra. Known as the greatest composer of the twentieth century, Bartok lived up to his reputation with the ingenious musicality of these two movements. The first, entitled "In Full Bloom", was filled with both romantic and modern images, creating a mood indeed reminiscent of the title. The orchestra performed the stark contrasts of agitation and harmony well, although sometimes the coherence was lost through sluggish phrasing.

Zest and life

The second movement, "Village Dance", was filled with vitality and performed with equal zest and life.

The final piece of the evening was Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in C Major - Op. 88. The orchestra gave this classical piece a solid and very organized performance. Of most noteworthy excellence was the waltz-like quality of the Allegretto grazioso carried through by the orchestra. The folksong-like melody of this movement was the most memorable of this evening of good music.

Haas

struction during its recent renovation and incorporated it into his eventual mural design. Haas is particularly interested in the concept of construction in general, of objects in a transitory phase toward their completion. The incomplete architecture of the mural seems right in its setting, for Haas noted that the space of the atrium strikes him as incomplete in itself.

The subject of the mural definitely presents this idea of incompletion. From the dome (inspired by the rotunda of the museum upstairs) to the basement of the building depicted, half of the architecture consists merely of a wooden framework.

Black and white

The mural's colors, too, contribute to this sense of an unfinished work; with the exception of the red bricks, which extend the illusion of the atrium's real walls, the image is predominantly black and white. Even the crows perched incidentally on a ledge are black. To Haas, black and white reflect the unfinished quality of a work in progress that he sought to capture.

Haas admits that his concerns in design have changed recently: "I've become a stickler for detail." The detail of this mural's design includes references to classical architecture, particularly the Ionic order (for you art historians). Haas' work has long involved recycling historical styles, like the classical, that were still studied but rarely used.

Why Griffin?

Another noteworthy detail is the inclusion of Griffin Hall in the window of the mural's building. Why Griffin? Haas simply points to Griffin as his favorite campus building. He painted it in a winter setting, partly because the drab whites and grays reflect incompletion and partly due to the season in which the mural was completed.

Haas' mural will be on view long past winter is over, but although now it seems to winter-weary students that it will be an eternity until the season surrenders to spring, it will not be. The next mural will begin construction in the fall. But don't wait for winter to end before viewing the mural gracing the museum's atrium.

Minorities

them to see the issues regardless of whether or not they decide to become active members of the WBSU when they come to Williams.

Gray-Murray said that racial issues are prominent on most college campuses now, and Williams does not sit in a class by itself. "I don't think Williams has a big problem," she added.

Kenyatta agreed that Williams is calm compared to other campuses. "Tufts and schools around the Philadelphia area are much more tense than here," she said.

Gray-Murray said she did not usually have to raise the question of racial tension with prospectives, because "many of the students are tuned into the problems of being a minority in a predominantly white college."

Difficulties in recruiting

Gray-Murray said it is hard to get minority students to come to Williams. Most of the minority students that Williams recruits are also being heavily recruited by other institutions which are often larger and better known than Williams and can offer a community that Williamstown can never offer, she said.

She also said that it is tougher to attract minority students from public schools in urban areas than students from private schools because they are usually less familiar with a college setting like Williams.

Kenyatta said she thought it was "hard to recruit black students because of overt incidents" and because black students are the most visible minority at Williams, and they "tend to get the brunt of a lot of stuff."

Kenyatta said that the Dean's Office works on an informal basis with the admissions office on minority recruitment. She said that when minority candidates come here, "black faculty and staff try to find time to talk to them about Williams has to offer."

Kenyatta said that seeing black faculty and staff around helps prospective students "to know that they are not coming into completely isolated situation."

Gray-Murray said the Admissions Office is working with the Dean's Office informally "to look more closely at the experience of being a minority at Williams — what are the quality of life issues, programatically and philosophically."

The admissions office is also working on a summer science program for 15 high school students, minorities and others, who are interested in science and science related areas. Smith said the program is being developed by biology professor Lee Drickamer.

Recruiting for Hispanics

Kenyatta pointed out that difficulties in recruiting Hispanic students here are also very high and that the admissions office is working closely with Vista, the Williams Hispanic organization, to step up recruiting efforts.

She said that it is particularly hard to recruit Hispanics because so few are eligible, and the pool of candidates is much smaller among Hispanics than among blacks.

One of the prospective students, Doug Rankin, a senior from Bronx Science, said there were no formal discussions about racism on campus during his visit, although there was some informal discussion among the hosts and prospectives.

Rankin said he had not met with anyone from the faculty, and his host felt that the charges about tension on campus were unjust.

Miriam Brown '88, a WBSU member and a host, said that WBSU members don't try to dissuade prospective black students from coming to Williams. She said there was no formal discussion of racism on campus this weekend.

Brown said that prospectives usually ask questions of their hosts like "do people walk up to you and call you nigger?" because they come from predominantly black high schools and base their questions on what they read and see on television.

Gerald Kirschner '88 talks to freshmen about housing for next year. Each housing category sent representatives to the information session last Wednesday night to persuade freshmen to choose their houses. (Rifkin) ity was unstable. We were not sure how to do anything: use telephones, watch television, mail letters, borrow library books, make bank deposits, and perhaps most importantly — how to buy deodorant.

But our confusion did not result only from different circumstances. Although we had things to do, we had no routine. It was a freshman week that lasted two months — without dorms or kegs. The weather was nice, so we meandered calmly from task to task, inevitably getting to where we needed to be at 1 p.m., 30 minutes after lunch hour began and an hour and a half before it would end. And when we came back, we had to stand on line for hours to find out the information we wanted was not there (Have I mentioned that they don't have course catalogues in France? We still haven't figured that out, we learn to live with it).

Aimless and confused, we wandered around Paris, in search of structure and a schedule.

The beginning of classes and November rolled around, and we found ourselves genuinely excited by our academic prospects, about the subjects, the professors, and most of all, the prospect of meeting students. We had been out of school for five months — longer than any other period in our lives. But even after five months of vacation, we came to remember all too quickly that school is just school. And, although it is what you make of it, almost no work was being demanded.

Some of us managed to get swept up in academics, but others could not help remembering the idealized Paris. We had not come here to study, we could do that much more effectively at home. We had come here precisely to learn about everything else. We had come here to do everything people do in Paris that makes it special. But the longer we stayed here, the less sure we were of exactly what that is. Commiserating, we sat endlessly, as hours and days passed, in cafes, in parks, in restaurants, and on street-corners, hoping to catch some glimpse; it was more than the movies, museums, models, and metros, it was indefinable.

As the winter came, the cold slowly forced us off the streets and out of the parks, we began painfully to realize that Paris might just be another place where life goes on; and what makes it so special is not the originality, but rather the imperturbability.

And as this realization comes slowly to us, we begin again to get on with our lives. After months of confusion and loneliness, we begin to recover from the traumatic loss of an idealized paradise. We study, we work, we play, we do whatever drives us — whatever has always driven us. Only, now we are as sure of what that is as we have ever been. And it is now, after we have identified ourselves, that we can begin to see Paris and perhaps the world. Paris never was, and will never be, salvation, meaning, the solution. There is nothing magical about it. What makes Paris so special (aside from the obvious aesthetic appeal) is the depth and variety of the paths that the individual who knows what he wants can take. We left college as sophomores, we will return as seniors, and our Junior year will have been a time not only of fear and solitude, but of reassurance in ourselves and the opportunities that lie ahead.

As we look back on our Junior Year in Paris, we may just decide that we found what we came looking for.

polls, and a balance of perspectives in the same issue. We're planning on putting in more point/counterpoint articles, which we didn't do very much of last year. We'll also have more articles on relevant issues of Williams College and not just national and world issues. There are certainly a lot of campus issues that could be debated."

Furthermore, you misrepresented and misunderstood our specific naming of the Affirmative Action Office as "structured on the basis of inactivity." If you had attended one of the more important College Council meetings last semester, you would have heard of the troubling impact which decentralized hiring of women and minorities at Williams. I apologize personally to Nancy McIntire if she took that statement in the letter as a personal attack. It was not meant to be such and was specifically worded so that it would point to a problem of which many informed members of the community are already aware.

I hope in the future you will deal more seriously with the topic of racism and intolerance. Your editorial last week presumed to give credit to the BSU for its "reasonable demands" and in so doing set itself up in a superior rhetorical position from which to judge the experiences and aspirations of many black students at Williams. I think you should ask yourselves whose views your editorial represented and whether you actually excluded black people, by your tone and wording, from even being a part of the community you attempt to represent and claim to have a journalistic responsibility to.

I.M. Report

The Sunday Night Basketball League playoffs are heating up with the top four seeds playing in the semifinals tonight at Lasell.

Top-seeded Pat O'Malley '87 and his squad prevailed over senior Guy Kurtz's club 56-45 behind 18 points from John Amoss '87 and 16 from Jeff Roth '87, moving into a semifinal clash with the 4th-ranked team captained by Drew Sawyer '89, which beat junior Nils Christoffersen's club 45-37 in a turnover-plauged contest. Willie Morris '89 had 12 and the sophomore twin towers of Dave Belscher and Clark West added 21.

The other semifinal pits the 2nd-seeded team headed by Rick Oriuk '87, which pounded Lew Collins '88 and Co. 90-61, behind Roland Anglin's 29 points against junior Mike Sullivan's team. Sullivan had 16 as they beat the Disease, despite 20 from Randy Schriver '89.

In the I.M. Ski Race, Gladden was victorious with 3 top-11 finishes, including Greg Fertik '87 in 2nd and John Norwood '87 in 7th, with Fitch-Currier 2nd and Fayerweather 3rd. Individually, Armstrong 's Ned Patterson '87 took 1st in a time of 40.49. Perry's Ken Lee '87 was 3rd, Mike LeBauer '88 of Dodd was 4th and Williams' Andy Kaplinsky '90 was 5th.

voters were capable of electing a man who was certainly a liar and probably also a war criminal.

In defense of the Austrian voters' choice, Haas briefly outlined the country's history since the fall of the Hapsburg empire.

He spoke of a troubled past, citing as examples the sad economic situation between the two world wars, the rise of fascism and the Anschluss.

Austria has enjoyed political peace, democracy and economic revival since 1955, Haas said.

The Waldheim affair, Haas said, has harmed this image. He gave four reasons for Waldheim's garnering 54 percent of the vote: a strong shift to the right, resentment of foreign interference, resentment against the Jewish Congress in New York for branding Austrian voters Nazis, resentment about the assumption that Austrian society stil harbors anti-Semitic tendencies.'

Haas said that the victory was due to an "emotional vote" and that the issues raised about Austrian voters' ethics had been more important than the debate about what Waldheim did or did not do.

He concluded by saying that although the Waldheim affair has done temporary damage to Austrian political life, this should not affect this country's position as a political asylum, a sender of peace-keeping troops to war-stricken parts of the world, neutral democracy and a bridge between East and West.

2-1 volleyball spikes Middlebury in sweep

by Marc McDermott

The men's volleyball team continued to play well as it upped its record to 2-1 with a shutout of Middlebury last Sunday.

The Ephs dominated Middlebury in workmanlike fashion in the first game, posting an easy 15-7 win. The Panthers came alive in the second game, however, jumping out to a 7-3 lead as Williams defensive mistakes. After a quick team meeting, the Ephmen rallied and came within one on a Bill Connich '88 slam forcing Middlebury to call time-out.

The Panthers came out of their huddie with fire in their eyes, but first year player Tim Fornum doused it immediately with a tremendous spike to tie the game. After that, the game belonged to Williams 15-9.

The Ephs won the final game 15-9 in a rout that was highlighted by six serving points in a row by Conich and jumping serves by John Ahn '87 and Sam Beltran '87. Co-captain Ahn and Beltran had nothing but praise for their teammates after the game. "We had an outstanding all-around game," said Ahn. "Everyone contributed. Mitch Wang played well and Bruiser (Bruce Pohlman '87) had some good hits."

After the game, Ahn already had his eyes on a rematch with University of Massachusetts next Sunday. "UMass beat us in five games but we were winning 17-10 in the final game before we got sloppy, made mistakes, and lost. We should get them in the grudge match."

Looking ahead, Williams has matches at Amherst tommorow, followed by a home match Saturday vs. Bates.

Charge for ECAC game

Admission was charged at Saturday night's basketball game. The $1 charge for students and $3 charge for others are required at tournament games by the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC), according to Robert Peck, Williams director of athletics. Peck said the college has not hosted an ECAC tournament game in several years.

"It's simply to reduce all eight (participating) teams' expenses," he explained. "All the expenses and income (generated by the tournament) are pooled by the colleges involved."

Peck added that the money raised by charging admission pays for, among other things, security officers and game officials. He also pointed out that money raised is sufficient for only part of the total bill, and the remaining deficit is divided equally among the eight colleges.

New rules for coops

Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta has approved a new procedure designed by the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) that will allow students who are to live in co-ops to choose in what co-op they want to live and with whom.

The procedure will begin with the class of 1989.

All applicants to co-op housing will attend a meeting in the spring, where they each will receive a number. The number of a group will be determined by the lowest number held by a member of that group.

The first group will be identified and asked to select a co-op house, the second group will then choose according to what is available and so on down the line until all the houses are filled.

The rules allow that a group may split up into different co-op houses if they do not all fit into a single house, but a group may not split up whereby some members of a group receive a co-op house and other members of that same group do not.

Housing Committee Chair Tom Fitzgibbon '87 said this change was made "to allow you to choose your own destiny". "People would rather live with people they know and know they can get along with," he said.

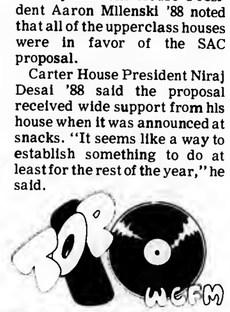
She added that, as far as the Williamstown Police were concerned, "I believe that the only way they'd intervene is if they were called."



Perry-Bascom House President Aaron Milenski '88 noted that all of the upperclass houses were in favor of the SAC proposal.

Carter House President Niraj Desai '88 said the proposal received wide support from his house when it was announced at snacks. "It seems like a way to establish something to do at least for the rest of the year," he said.

Winter Sports Season Wrapups

M. Squash

by Chuck Samuelson

Last weekend the men's squash team wrapped up a highly successful season at the 1987 Intercollegiate Championships at Yale.

After finishing the regular season with a number-seven ranking in the nation, the Ephs' top six players journeyed to New Haven and finished eighth behind the same teams that were in the top six and a very tough squad from Western Ontario.

The Ephs fought hard throughout the tournament. McCall said the players refused to give up: "Everyone went down with a fight." In the A division, Keith Goldfeld '87 lost his first match but came back to win the consolation round, and Wendell Chestnut '88 won his first match 3-0 before losing to the tourney's number-two seed, John Sprenger of Navy.

Matt McCall '87, seeded 12th, won his first two matches 3-0 and 3-2 before falling to the B division's eventual winner, Spencer Wall, another Middie. Dana Weeder '88 won his first his first match 3-0 before caving in to the division's fourth-seed.

Both Ephs in the C division were seeded. Lewis Fisher '89, seeded seventh, advanced all the way to the quarter-finals before losing to the number-one seed. Rick Hedeman '88, who was the 14th seed, won his first two matches 3-1 before losing to last year's number-two ranked junior player Sam Crew, 3-2. McCall had nothing but praise for Hedeman's performance. "Rick Hedeman played the best match he's ever played in his college career."

Coach Sean Sloane recognized his team's killer instinct. "Any match we were in, we won." He also said that the team's successful regular season carried them through the Intercollegiates and helped prevent the burnout that often rolls around by the end of the season.

Sloane also said that one of the keys to the success of this year's team was the improvement they showed during the course of the season. "I've never had a team improve so consistently from 1-9 throughout the season."

McCall offered an explanation for the team's winning ways. He said: "(the) team knew the potential it had and would do anything to realize it." Among the reasons for the fulfillment of the team's potential was a psychological training program called Ideal Performance State, which helped the players to concentrate in pressure situations.

McCall said that the team's closeness also helped the team during the season. Goldfeld said that as opposed to teams of years past, this year's team had no superstars and was "a lot closer talent-wise."

The team established many habits this year that can only help them in the future. McCall is optimistic about the chances of a team that will lose two of its top three players. "Next year's team will do just as well if not better."

Track

by Steve Brody

The East Coast Athletic Conference Track championships provided an opportunity for Williams to turn in some top performances this weekend, with the women's team at Smith, and the men running at Bates.

Four Williams records were set by the women, who placed seventh in the meet with 27 points (compared to two points last year) behind winner University of Massachusetts-Boston. Dawn Macauley '89 highlighted the meet for Williams with a win in the 600 yards. Her time of 1:26.44 was 2.2 seconds under the old Williams record. Susan Gray '90 ran 2:20.22 in the 800 meters, taking second place and besting both the indoor and outdoor Williams records.

Jen Morris '89 broke the record in the 1000 yards by running 2:51.1 in the first heat. However, three minutes later in the second heat, Sara St. Antoine '88 crossed the finish line in 2:49.3 to place third and recapture the record which she had set earlier in the season. The fourth record that fell was in the 1500 meters, where Anne Knott '88 ran 4:49.81. Rounding out the scoring for the Ephs was Kate Pugh '87, sixth in the 5000 meters.

The men were led by senior distance runners Dave Grossman and Jon Fisher. Grossman stayed with Bates star John Fitzgerald for the first mile of the 3000 meters, then ran alone in second place for the last mile to finish in a personal record of 8:42. Fisher took the race "easy" but came back strong in the third lap and finished in third-place. His time was an excellent 2:30, five seconds under his previous best.

Also scoring for the Ephmen were Scott Purdy '88, sixth in a strong 55 meter hurdle field in 8.14 seconds, and Joe McGinn '88, fifth in the weight throw

The Ephs now look forward to the outdoor season. Head coach Richard Farley says the outdoor squad "is one of the best we've had." Their objective: "To challenge MIT for the (Division III) New England Championship," said Grossman.

Swimming

by Kurt Oeler

Despite strong, season-ending performances by many individuals, the women's and men's swimming teams could only manage identical runnerup finishes in the New England Championships. The women fell to defending champion Tufts, while the University of Massachusetts stripped the men of their title.

Two weeks ago in the women's meet, Joan Horgan '87 enjoyed a good weekend, as the senior captured the prestigious Kay Fromer Award, given to the meet's outstanding senior.

Distance freestylers Jen Raymond '87 and Michelle Freemer '90 refused to be outshined by dominating the 1650, earning valuable points for the Ephs, who were struggling to hold off Bowdoin.

Entering the final event, the 400 free relay, Williams needed a win and a less than third-place finish by the Polar Bears to hold on to second. The Eph relay team did their part, taking Williams' fourth relay win of the meet, and watched joyfully as Bowdoin failed in their bid to pass the Ephwomen.

One week later, Dan Snyder '90 stole the show on the men's final day. Seeded third in the 1650, the freshman devastated a veteran field with a school record 16:16.8. Snyder also broke the school's freshman and varsity records in the 1000 during the race.

Classmate Rob Benson finished second in the 200 fly, and Evan Davis '89 captured third in the 200 breast. The men easily beat third-place So. Conn. and left the meet with spectacular credentials: five new varsity and two new freshman records, three freshman champions and eight national qualifiers.

This weekend, Horgan, Raymond, Freemer and diver Jen Campbell '87 travel to Canton, Ohio for the women's Division III Nationals. The small contingent will be hard-pressed to duplicate last year's ninth-place finish. The men will encounter no such problem. Eight men will compete in two weeks at the men's championships, also in Canton.

From The Locker Room

by Stewart Verdery

Who's the best basketball conference? When the Big Ten and Big East don't live up to billing in the NCAA's, people will again look to the ACC as the best. Even in an off year, the ACC rules.

In the East, UNC should shake off the ACC tourney loss and advance through a tough road to New Orleans that will include Navy, Notre Dame and Syracuse. The Orangemen will nip Valvano's Wolfpack before being beaten by 30 by J.R. Reid and crowd.

The South will see a titanic showdown between Georgetown and Clemson if Tiger Grayson Marshall is healthy. Clemson will emerge victorious as Horace Grant dominates Reggie Williams on the boards. The Tigers will then beat Alabama, winners over UNO and Illinois, to move to the Final Four.

DePaul will finally shake off the Mark Aguirre-Terry Cummings NCAA curse and top Temple and Duke in the Midwest to reach New Orleans. Indiana, worn out by the Big Ten infighting, will fall to another SEC team, Auburn.

Iowa is the only Big Ten team that will live up to expectations as Tom Davis will lead the 'Eyes by UTEP, Oklahoma (conquerers of Pitt) and UNLV to claim the West. The Rebels will do well, beating Idaho St., Georgia and Virginia, thanks to Gerald Paddio and the three-point shot.

In the Final Four, North Carolina will nip Clemson and Iowa will slip by DePaul to set up an ACC-Big Ten final. Jeff Lebo will be named MVP as freshmen Reid and Scott Williams dominate the inside over the bewildered Hawkeyes.

by Al Mottur

This year's NCAA tourney will be the Reggie Williams show. The silky 6'7" senior will prove that he is the best forward in the nation in leading the Georgetown Hoyas to their 2nd National Championship.

In the East, look for UNC and Syracuse to meet in the regional final with Syracuse gaining the "W." UNC has never made it to the final four following a defeat in the ACC tourney. Expect this trend to continue as Jim Boeheim will get a long-awaited trip to the final four.

Looking South, G'town is on a fierce roll which should continue all the way to Mardi Gras. Their recent defensive pressure is reminiscent of the Ewing era and is fueled by the best depth in the nation. The surprise team in this region ... New Orleans! My pick for tournament cinderella, this team will almost go all the way before succumbing to the Hoya press.

In the Midwest, the Alford-led Hooslers will roll through the region. Last year's tourney was a humiliation for Bobby Knight and he won't let his Indiana squad fall short of New Orleans.

In the West, UNLV will be run down by a superior-coached Virginia team. The Cavaliers almost beat a better team in UNC and should benefit from referee bias against Tarkanian's troops. Virginia will then stun Iowa for a trip to the Superdome.

At New Orleans, G'town will down the 'Cuse for the fourth straight time and Indiana will beat Virginia. In the finals, look for the Hoyas to edge the Hooslers in one of the best title games ever.

Eph backcourt propels hoops into ECAC showdown versus Amherst

by Stewart Verdery

During a week of exciting conference tournaments around the country, the Williams basketball squad brought a little of their own magic to bear on the East Coast Athletic Conference playoffs. Led by a dominating backcourt of Garcia Major '90 (33 points) and Henry Jones '88 (22), the fourth-seeded Ephs ended Babson's season Saturday with a convincing 92-82 victory.

Coupled with Amherst's win over Tufts, the game sent Williams into a semifinal encounter with the Lord Jeffs tomorrow night at 7:30 at Amherst. The two teams split their Little Three contests, Amherst winning at home 88-75 and Williams returning the favor at Lasell Gymnasium 73-68. The other semifinal matches second-seeded Framingham State and sixth-seeded Colby. If Colby and Williams are matched in the final, it would be held in Lasell.

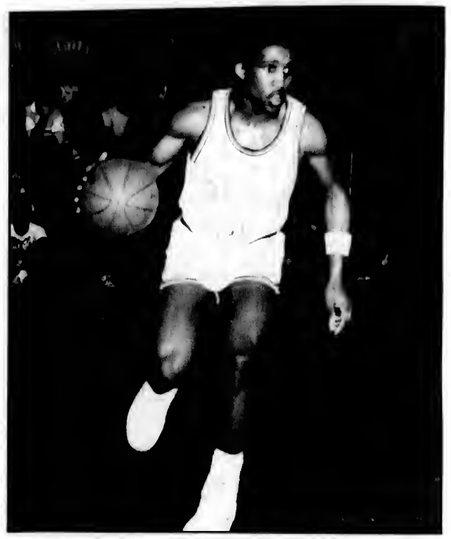
Guards dominate

The first ever ECAC home playoff game at Williams started out as The Garcia Major Show. The freshman point guard scored 11 points in the opening seven minutes to help Williams open up an early ten-point lead. When Major cooled off, Jones took over, tallying 13 in the half.

However, Babson was finally able to shut down the Eph secondary fast break, and when Williams' shooting tailed off towards intermission, the Beavers climbed even at 35. Then, as the capacity crowd watched on, Babson's Sean Henseler heaved in a 50-foot desperation three-point bank shot to give the Beavers a 38-37 halftime lead.

After an even four minutes opened the second half, Williams moved out to a seven-point lead on a Major coast-to-coast hoop, prompting a Babson timeout at 14:36. Unlike a first half TO which had halted an Eph surge, the strategy was futile as Major then exploited Babson's lack of backcourt quickness. The Eph freshman ran rampant for 13 points over a five-minute span en route to a 22-point half. However, Williams was unable to extend its margin as the teams traded baskets to a 71-66 score.

Major then scored his last hoop of the game, as he lofted in a prayer-in-the-air while being hacked. Tony Costa tried to keep Babson in the game with long-range shooting, but Brandt Johnson '87, whose boardwork was crucial as usual, threw in three key hoops to push the lead to 12 with a minute remaining.



Babson was left to fouling, but Johnson, Jones, Major and Mike Masters '89 all hit freebies to counter Babson baskets. Just as in last week's game against Wesleyan, Dave Paulsen '87 ended the contest by nailing two free throws for probably the last Eph points in Lasell.

Coach Harry Sheehy noted that the win was the 15th of the season for the Ephs, their highest win total since 1974. Considering the Ephs lost their top scorer and leader in Tim Walsh '86 and opened the season with an inexperienced backcourt and small frontcourt, the entire year has been a great tonic for last year's disappointing finish. With the addition of the three-point shot and an up-tempo game led by Major and Jones, it is no suprise that Sheehy calls the Ephs "a lot of fun to watch."

Amherst analysis

The game against Amherst will likely hinge on how well the Ephs can control Jeff star Yram Groff. Groff, a first-team District selection, burned the Ephs for 32 points in the first meeting and led a comeback that almost wiped out a 19-point Eph lead in the game at Williams. Masters held Groff in check for much of the second game and will likely draw the assignment when Williams is in man defenses.

Other keys will be the battle inside between Amherst's John McCarthy and the Ephs' Greg Lang '87 and Williams' ability to handle a tough press. In game one, Lang was hampered by fouls and played only sparingly. In the rematch, McCarthy was soiled for 13 Lang points, but more importantly, for 13 Lang rebounds.

Freshman point guard Garcia Major charges upcourt in the Ephs' dismantling of Babson Saturday night in opening-round action of the ECAC playoffs. Major had a career-high 33 points. (LeBauer)

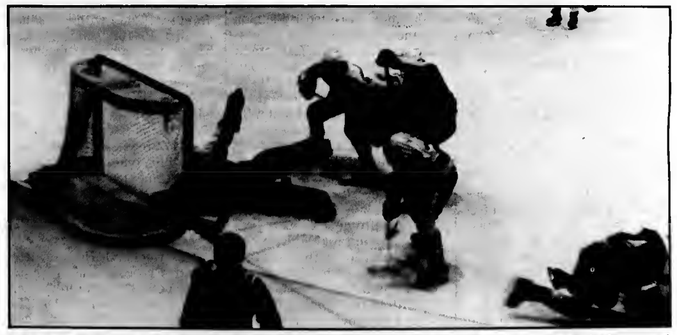
Playoffs elude hockey while 8 seniors depart

by Al Mottur

A squad that contained eight experienced seniors and a returning core of talented sophomores, this year's men's hockey team was expected to have a better season than last winter's 3-17-3 unit. A final record of 7-13-2 indicates that strides were made in the right direction. But this mark is not very indicative of the hockey team this year.

Most sub .500 teams feast on the hapless also-rans while succumbing to the powers at the top. To the contrary, the Williams skaters found surprising success against better teams such as Army, Connecticut College and Norwich, while falling to non-playoff contenders Middlebury, Union, and Division III Amherst.

Playing a tough schedule which included 11 games against playoff teams, the Ephs seemed hard-pressed all season to maintain intensity against equal or inferior opponents, seemingly getting up for just the big games. Coach Bill McCormick said that he eschewed playing the softer schedule because, "We need to play a schedule recruits respect. If we played Amherst and Wesleyan each twice (both Div. III) our recruits might not want to come here."



The schedule was not all that plagued the Ephs this year. An erratic power play, goaltending which at times was worse than mediocre and many poorly taken penalties belied the effort the rest of the team was exerting during games.

When most of these areas did click, the team managed to pull off its several impressive wins. However, against their weaker opponents, the Ephs often had problems maintaining regularity in any of these areas. McCormick said that on the power play "we need a quarterback ... not necessarily a player who is a high scorer, but someone who controls the play with poise and experience."

Final Hockey Stats

Babson attempts to stave off an Eph scoring threat in hockey action this winter. The Ephs improved to a 7-13-2 record during the 1986-87 campaign. (McDermott)

Next year

Pointing towards next year, the coach indirectly addressed some of the other problem areas saying that "our critical concerns will be to cut down on penalties, get consistently good performance in net, and find defensive replacements who can come in and pick up the slack right away."

The team loses three senior defensemen in Taylor Watts, John Booth and Tim McKone, all of whom were regulars. Also a big loss will be the senior line of Chris Traggio, Denny Wright, and Craig Cheevers, which was one of the squad's most effective trios towards the year's end.

McCormick expects his sophomores to step in along with Ron Van Belle '90 and Dave Bakken '90 to continue to produce offensively. The class of '89 line of Chris Conway, Will Putnam and Mike Swenson was for the second straight year the team's most productive overall line totalling 57 points. And two-thirds of the Mike O'Connell '87, Chris Donato '89 and Van Belle line remains, a unit that meshed exceedingly well as the year progressed.

Season Highlights

The squad started the season with a four-game stretch before winter break in which it went 1-2-1, defeating Norwich 4-3 and tying A.I.C. 5-5. The A.I.C. game was notable in that the Ephs were trailing by three with under ten minutes to play, yet managed to rally and tie. In that game, Putnam recorded the first Eph hat trick of the season.

Upon return from break, the skaters hosted the Williams Invitational in which it lost in two overtimes to Canisius and then walloped North Adams 7-2 for a third-place finish. Against the Mohawks, Swenson and Van Belle each dented the nets three times and senior netminder Rick Dietz turned in the first of his several solid efforts on the year.

Following a three-game losing skid, the Ephs accomplished their only winning streak of the season by dowing Conn. College 7-5 and New England College 3-2. Against the Camels, defenseman Tim Frechette '89 scored the gamewinner, evidence of his emergence this year as a scorer as opposed to his role last season as a defensive bruiser.

The Ephs then lost to Colby and Bowdoin before shocking Div. I Army at home 2-1. This win was the most impressive Eph effort of the campaign and was highlighted by the stellar goaltending of Dietz as well as an all-around tight, defensive and physical play.

Following the edging of the Cadets, the team lost the Little Three by falling to Amherst 5-4 and tying Wesleyan 2-2. These two games were spaced between losses to Hamilton and Union which put the team out of the ECAC playoff picture.

The squad ended the year by splitting its last four games gaining home victories over Middlebury (5-3) and Westfield St. (7-3) and falling to Babson at home and Salem St. on the road.

Zinn faces Chestnut in CC run-off

by Paul Kwon

A run-off election is being held today and tomorrow between the two leading tickets for College Council President and Vice President, Carter Zinn '88-Nicole Meicher '88 and Wendell Chestnut'88-Pavlos Yeroulanos '88.

Neither ticket received a majority of the votes in the primary election. Zinn and Meicher received 33.0 percent of the votes cast, 305, while the Chestnut-Yeroulanos ticket received 21.6 percent or 200 votes.

Nathan Schimke '88 and Kenneth April '88 (190 votes), the Nerd Party candidates, and the David Kane '88-Andrew Harris '88 (183 votes) ticket just missed qualifying for the run-offs. Trailing the field were Anne Shulman '88 and Brooke Ackerly '88, who received 46 votes or five percent of the votes casted.

Juniors Carter Zinn (left) and Wendell K. Chestnut face each other in the College Council run-offs for president.

Zinn said that he does not think that his sizable margin over Chestnut and Yeroulanos makes him the favorite going into the run-offs.

Chestnut agreed with Zinn, saying, "I was impressed with the margin between Carter and us, but I feel that they were working harder than we were to get to that point. I don't consider ourselves as underdogs; I think it's a balanced race."

Zinn attributed his and Meicher's success in the primaries to their knowledge of the important issues. "I think that the voters appreciated our new outlook on what the College Council can do. It's gratifying to know that we did so well without using propaganda or videos, but just on the issues."

Chestnut also credited issues for the success of his ticket, saying, "The fact that we're dealing with the major issues on campus appealed to voters. We dealt with the minority and sex-

SAC withdraws party fund at deans' request

by Debbie Snyder

The Student Activities Committee (SAC) withdrew the first part of its all-campus party fund proposal, the part calling for a central fund administered by SAC to organize all-campus parties, in a letter to the student body on Friday, March 13.

The letter said that the second part of the proposal, which provided for a committee of liaisons from each house, will still exist. All money contributed to the SAC from houses will be returned.

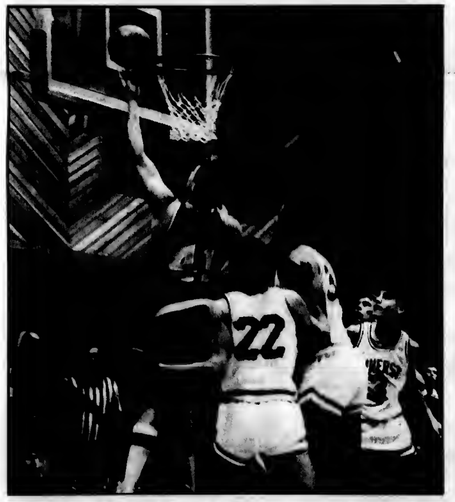
The letter was written by outgoing SAC president Hans Humes '87, incoming SAC president Matt Lapointe '88, and SAC treasurer A.J. Mediratta '87 last Thursday after they met with Dean of the College Stephen Fix, Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta and Director Ransom Jenks.

Overlap with dean's plan

"As the dean's office has now completed a more comprehensive plan for funding student parties the SAC realizes that part one of our party plan has become redundant," the letter said.

The college's revised party policy, which will be announced immediately after spring break, Fix said, includes a funding mechanism similar to that proposed by the SAC.

Fix said the proposed funding mechanism was designed to enable houses to have parties without charging at the door, because the ban on charging will continue.



Fix: "startled"

"We were startled to see this thing. It was not presented to the deans even for comment," Fix said.

"We never wished to step on their toes, " Mediratta said. "The only reason we didn't go to the deans is because it was a short term proposal and we thought it would get bogged down. We created it and made it work in a matter of weeks."

Mediratta and Lapointe said that they felt that the SAC had

Ephmen capture first ECAC championship

by Stewart Verdery

"I couldn't ask for any better way to go out." Eph basketball captain Greg Lang '87 summed up pefectly the emotions of the Ephs after their 98-87 victory Saturday over Framingham State gave them the East Coast Athletic Conference title for the first time ever. The win, coming three days after a 89-75 semifinal thrashing of Amherst, culminated a 17-win season for Williams, the most wins by the squad in 25 years.

The Ephs whipped Framingham with their best all-around effort of the season. Everyone contributed: Garcia Major '90 with 22 points, Henry Jones '88 with 17 second-half points, Brandt Johnson '87 with three key hoops in the face of a Ram comeback, Greg Lang '87 with two steals in the final two minutes, Mike Masters '89 with passing and nine points, and Bill Meichionni '89 with tough defense and clutch free throws.

Faculty approves two new majors

by Lisa Nahf

The faculty approved the establishment of an Asian Studies major, a Literary Studies major and an Interdepartmental Program for Experimental and Cross-Disciplinary Studies at last Wednesday's faculty meeting.

The changes were recommended by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP).

President Francis Oakley announced the appointment of biology professor Joan Edwards to replace psychology professor Robert Kavanaugh as Dean of Freshmen. History professor William Wagner will fill Edward's current seat as Assistant Dean of the College.

Asian Studies major

The Asian Studies major will allow extensive language study and exposure to Asian cultures. Development of the major came in response to what Professor of History Peter Frost termed "strong student interest." Ten students have submitted contract major proposals in Asian Studies to the CEP.

Some questions arose regarding the major's structure at the meeting. Professor of Philosophy Laszlo Versenyi questioned the necessity of having an 11 course requirement for the major.

Most faculty, however, seemed to feel that, as in other interdisciplinary majors, 11 courses were necessary. Assistant Professor of History Gail Hershatter said, "The major is structured this way because we are looking at a complex part of the world. The various disciplines approach the subject in different ways."

"A sampling of courses gives students a feel for the major. But perhaps the committee should develop a special concepts course that meets the purposes of the major," professor Raymond Baker said.

In response, religion professor Mark Taylor said, "I expect that a concepts course will come into its own within a few years."

Literary Studies major

The Literary Studies major was proposed as an alternative to the study of literature by nation. The new major combines the study of a language with the study of comparative literature and literary theory.

Joan Edwards

"This major and the courses specifically designed for it represent an enhancement of language and literary study," said Assistant German Professor Gail Newman.

The Program for Experimental and Cross-Disciplinary Studies is designed to provide a forum for the development and administration of experimental courses and courses that fall outside of the established departments.

Existing experimental courses

The Freshman Residential Seminars and the student-initiated course "Nonviolence and Social Change" are two existing courses that would fall under this program's jurisdiction.

Previously, an instructor with a new proposal had to do a great deal of logistical work in order to implement it. The program is intended to ease the burden on the instructor.

"This program would be an administrative body which would help new ideas get a fair hearing and get organized," Dean of the Faculty John Reichert said. "Many ideas have come up in the past and have languished for want of a home. This would provide welcome and help for new ideas that would be beneficial for the process of moving the curriculum forward."

In other business, all course changes for the 1987-88 academic year were approved.

The Williams Record

The courage of their convictions

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) met last night, although you wouldn't have known it by reading the Weekly Calendar, where the committee's meetings are supposed to be announced. It's the second time this year that the announcement has been overlooked.

The calendar listing is a relatively minor symptom of a larger problem that plagues the committee — something with a significance which dates back to the committee's inception over eight years ago.

The ACSR emerged from a period of student activism in the late 1970s and early 1980s — a time when there was arguably a strong consensus here for divestment — to address students' complaints that the trustees were unreachable.

Some criticized the committee, then and now, as being merely a buffer between students and the power structure of the college. Critics said it would spend so much time dealing with trivia (in the form of shareholder proxies) that it would do nothing to address the serious moral issue of investments with South African connections.

Administrators, then and now, defended the committee as a public forum for discussion of the issues. The essential feature of the committee — the thing that was new — was that it was to work in the open.

The Record went to press before the Monday's meeting, but if that meeting was anything like previous ones, it is easy to guess why members would just as soon not want any students there. That way, they don't have to enter into the contrived state they call "executive session."

Executive session, as used by most governmental bodies in the United States, applies to discussion of sensitive issues such as salary negotiations with employees and contract negotiations. Implicit in this definition is that any voting — even on the issues discussed in closed session — is done in a public, open meeting.

But, in a reverse of this logic, the ACSR invokes "executive session" in order to vote in secret on its recommendations to trustees, which this time of year consist basically of shareholder resolutions in companies which do business in South Africa. It holds discussions in the open and then votes in secret.

ACSR member and College Treasurer William Reed said the aim of the policy is to protect the identities of those casting votes.

This is wrong-headed. The members of the ACSR should have the courage of their convictions.

College President Francis Oakley, and John Chandler before him, urged students to debate the issue of divestment on the high ground of rational, thoughtful debate. Students should not be intimidated into favoring one side or the other, they said. Why is the same not true for the ACSR?

The "rational debate" appeal wins a lot of respect from Williams students. If the ACSR is open, that promotes open, fair debate on campus; it does not discourage it.

ACSR members should show they believe in a rational debate — and let their voting be public — or they should eliminate the false image of their committee.

Write it down

Last week's College Council elections and this week's run-offs raise some interesting but disturbing questions about council election procedures:

- In what situation is a run-off necessary?
- How are candidates selected for a run-off position?
- What percentage of the student body must vote for an election to be valid?
- What are the restrictions, if any, on campaign practices?
- How is voting regulated to ensure that only those eligible to vote for minority representative or for a housing category representative fill in those sections of the ballot?

Many of these questions have generally accepted answers; election procedures from year to year tend to be fairly consistent. The hard facts, however, that election procedures are nowhere clearly defined and codified. The College Council constitution — which specifically addresses many of the questions surrounding constitutional amendments and no-confidence votes — fails to clearly define the procedures governing each year's series of elections.

To protect the validity and integrity of every election, election procedures must be clearly identified and spelled out. And the best place to incorporate the procedures would be the constitution, for it would ensure consistent procedural application from one year to the next.

Wendell Chestnut or Carter Zinn — whichever one is victorious tommorow night — should put this high on his list of priorities for the new council.

Party!

To the Editor::

Since a story in last week's Record raised questions about the progress of efforts to review the College's alcohol and party policies, I am writing to report that they are now nearly complete, and that a comprehensive statement of these new policies will be in students' boxes upon their return from spring break. The policies will be effective immediately.

Setting these policies has been a difficult task, involving complex legal and social issues. I appreciate the patience and cooperation members of the College community have shown in the process of finding solutions that are fair, clear, and responsive to the need for an active social life at Williams.

ACSR

To the Editor:

I am disappointed that the candidates to the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility were not required to present positions or concerns about ACSR objectives prior to the student elections. To my understanding, College Council members supervising the elections did not ask Jason Phillips, Brian Jennings, or Betty Dunkum to define their positions in a statement of any kind beforehand. The Record did not even print their names in its election issue, reflecting an unexplainable disinterest in their candidacies.

With the amount of attention that has been focused on the divestment issue alone, the role of the ACSR members cannot be played down. If the referendum that was held three months ago is to have anything greater than a token significance, we must continue to recognize the significance and the potential of student input on this campus, and the necessity to act in a manner that will respect that input — as the Record itself has repeatedly urged in respect to other campus issues.

The ACSR election process was carried out in disregard to this input. The process was carried out as if we were just going through the motions. I could not feel confident that the candidates were going to represent my views, or those of the campus as expressed in the referendum, simply because I did not know enough about them. Apparently, it was felt that I did not need to know anything about them.

I do not want to make the ACSR seem any more or less important than it actually is, nor am I trying to blame anyone for that which is already done or not done. However, if having a student rep in this committee is important enough to deserve a space on a campuswide ballot, then I think that these words deserve some consideration. I hope that things will be done differently next year.

Crewbies

To the Editor:

Having earned my Rowing Merit Badge in the Boy Scouts, I appreciate the endeavors of the Crew club. Nonetheless, members of the Williams College academic community must share the school's limited resources equally, and I find the weightroom conduct of the paddlers extremely confrontational.

Last week, as I tried to complete my routine, paddlers rudely blocked my eforts to obtain an unused Olympic bar, informing me that I was interrupting 'varsity crew practice.' This news shocked me, since the weekly Advisor clearly designated the weightroom for recreational use that afternoon. Further, I was surprised to learn, too, that paddlers have obtained varsity status.

Perhaps they will use the money newly allotted to them by the Athletic Department to purchase more bars or replace the bars they have ruined through improper use and gross negligence.

Unfortunately, this incident is not an isolated one. In the future, I hope that the paddlers can extend some of the teamwork they value so highly to other members of the Williams community.

Effort to fight racism has to trust student commitment by Raqueli Holmes '90

The BSU has recently attempted to make the student body aware of the problems that it has seen with the College and "demanded" various actions to change them. The letter alienated many people by its lack of evidence and harshness of tone. The group assumed that it was the only one concerned with or experiencing discrimination at Williams and it did not recognize the need or desire of other students to speak out against discrimination.

I think it is important to remember when reading the BSU letter that was presented by the BSU that racism is not always an overt act that one can point to and say, "Look, here is racism." Such subtle acts are difficult to explain in a letter to the campus. The motivation for the letter was good in that there was a desire to address problems here at Williams not previously brought out in the open.

There hasn't been any room, however, for channeling of the interest, concern, or even anger of the student body that the letter has created. After having read the letter, I felt boggled and confused as to what to do next in order to deal with the situation placed before me. What is there that I and others can do to show support of those experiencing discrimination? This information was left out of the letter.

This year there have been a number of panel discussions sponsored by the BSU, but they have dealt mainly with divestment and not the situation on campus. The issue of divestment is an important one, but the issue of race relations on campus has a greater impact on all of us. There has been nothing to bring about cross-cultural experiences on campus. There is a need for non-political groups that allow people to gain a better understanding of one another.

Although some people may not be black and don't experience discrimination in relationship to race, they too can have experienced different forms of discrimination and can be sensitive to another person's problems. It is important for people to start talking and questioning, not with the intent to attack or form more critical judgements, but rather to create understanding or a desire for understanding. Ways to do that could be to attend panel discussions or conferences like "the Black Family in America and the Feminization of Poverty," or to make use of the organizations available like SOAR which can be used to try and transcend cultural barriers.

We must realize that not everyone's experience is the same, but it is just as valid as our own. With this realization, we can finally start the process of lessening racial tensions.

Rain or snow: Eph's win finds the Williams spirit

by Nat McCormick '88

Few of us that night were there for the first conflagration, but we all witnessed the second — the basketball game that left the polished court of Amherst's new LeFrak Gymnasium smoking and the home crowd stifled.

Not only was this almost a reversal of Amherst's 88-75 defeat of Williams here in January, not only a confirmation of Williams' February victory in Lasell, but a trouncing of the number-one ranked team in the ECAC tournament and a ticket to the finals in Framingham.

Last week the finals were played, and as the new ECAC champs, the Ephs deserve congratulations. But the game I will remember is this one. Its impact doesn't come from the propriety of the outcome alone (The win gives Williams a solid 25-game lead over Amherst in their 86-year rivalry), but from the energy and enthusiasm of the Eph team and crowd, which threatened to burst the shiny shell of LeFrak. As the clock ran down, the Williams spirit was exemplified by Coach Sheehy, who performed a leaping guitar pump of victory that would have convinced Pete Townshend to retire to pinball.

Even before the game started, an incident occurred which seemed symbolic to the crowd. As the fans watched, Lord Jeff strutted into the gym in his red costume and bright sword, only to be accosted by an officer in his blue costume and bright badge. The weapon was confiscated, and Jeff's emasculation seemed to portend the impotence of his team against Williams. This event also provoked the Eph fans to question the sex of their rival throughout the game, not without reason, for the Jeff of the first half, who sported a crewcut, was replaced in the second by a "Jeff" with long blond tresses. The mudslinging was fierce, but the court became the proving ground which left the Eph players spotless and the Eph fans chanting," Hey, hey, hey, goodbye!"

If you've ever doubted the importance of sports at Williams, this game might have settled those doubts for good. Beyond the impressive playing, consider the support for Williams, which consisted of a crowd at least as large as the home crowd, and twice as vociferous. The five-hour pilgrimage this crowd made to support the team displayed an enthusiasm untouchable by any number of Amherst fans who made the five-minute trek from their library. As I passed that building on my way to the game, I noticed that most of them had not bothered.

If you still question the role of sports at Williams,, consider this scenario: you are standing around at an alumni gathering — say in Naples, when an older gentleman comes over and introduces himself. "Spike Fleetstocking, class of '28, are you having a GT?"

You look down at your drink. "No, a martini."

He grins and claps you on the back. As you watch the carpet soak up your martini, he says: "Not Gin and Tonic, young fella....in my day a GT meant a Good Time. You see, in the spring of '28 we were all in training — I was a track man—couldn't drink at all...."

When he finishes his story, he pumps your hand again and asks if they've admitted girls yet to Williams before wandering off. You watch him go, realizing that this type of fond recollection has built the new Chandler Gym. Whether alumni were athletes, or just part of the crowd, sports seem to reinforce their enthusiasm for the College, and infuse their memories with vitality.

And, perhaps in forty years...."The basketball team, back in '87 ....victorious tournament game against ... oh, Amherst. Yes, I remember it well...." Your young audience will listen to the story, his eyes on your face, and his drink on the carpet.

Some parting shots on way to Spring Break

As I count down the days until spring break (three at this point, if you count Friday), I've been thinking about a few of the current issues facing the college. So, this week I decided to cover a bunch of things in one column. Here goes.

Another Word
by Andrew Mayer

• First off, let's consider the recklessness of the Student Activities Council (SAC), notably Hans Humes '87 and his buddies Matt Lapointe '88 and AJ Mediratta '87. Judging from his comments last week, Humes and the SAC are obviously overestimating their worth in relation to the administration.

Yes, party policy is a high priority and, yes, the administration seems to be dragging its heels a bit, but trying to put a plan into effect without getting the approval of the deans' office is unthinkable. Consider this: if any of the money goes towards alcohol, both the SAC and the administration could have Mr. Lawsuit hanging over Mr. Shoulders. Supposedly this won't happen.

Bypassing the deans and the college lawyer was still a shabby move. It serves SAC right that the deans' office stepped in and put SAC in their place. The administration's party plan, after all, will be implemented after spring break.

• Moving on a bit, I'm getting increasingly disgusted with our athletic department. I know. Athletics are not a priority at Williams. Academics are. But to student supporters of athletics and athletes themselves, gross inequalities are evident.

For example, the women's varsity softball team, in its first year of non-club status, was simply left off the rotation for winter practices in Towne Field House. The team is forced to rotate in whenever the lacrosse and baseball teams give way, but more often than not end up practicing from 10 p.m. to midnight.

In addition, the athletic department might think about paying Assistant Hockey Coach Bill Jacobs '74. He devoted his time for one and a half years and then asked for a little reimbursement and they told him to walk.

Perhaps the lacrosse team's transportation bill to Florida could be paid. After all, the baseball team doesn't pay for its gas. And how about recognizing the Williams Horse Showing Team and paying their coach? Or don't they consider that athletics?

• Speaking of the athletics, how many of you know that the New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC), of which Williams is a member, prohibits teams from making appearances in the NCAA national tournaments? Their reasoning is that it takes too much time away from academics.

My reasoning is different. If a team deserves to be there, let them go. Ski team members went to the nationals in Anchorage recently because they had qualified, and more power to them. But if the basketball team were to go undefeated, ranked number one in NCAA division III, it would only play in the ECAC tournament and not in the NCAA tournament. Something needs to be done about this.

• The third issue today is College Council elections. What a sham. Five sets of candidates for the top offices and no one can come up with anything new to propose, save the idiotic proposal about limiting parking tickets to $5, which I won't even begin to critique here.

I believe a revised election system, as suggested in the Record two weeks ago, requiring prospective candidates to collect signatures before entering to show support, will force candidates to really think about their platforms before entering.

I'm sick and tired of hearing about increased communication and how every candidate will be able to solve divestment and racism problems by meeting with WAAC and WBSU members. What makes them think that they can do it when others before them have tried the same thing and failed?

Have a fun and safe break. See you in April.

Jennings, Phillips vie for ACSR

INTERVIEWS

Record reporter Susanne Abell interviewed Bryan Jennings '89 and Jason Phillips '89, who are in the run-offs for representative to the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility about their reasons for running. Excerpts from the interview follow.

Bryan Jennings (left) and Jason Phillips, both sophomores, are in the run-offs for representative to the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. (Hazen)

Q: Why did you run?

JENNINGS: I ran because the problems on campus gave me the idea that the trustees weren't doing as much as they probably could to please the students and because I want to be on College Council and ACSR seems to be a very interesting committee.

PHILLIPS: I ran for ACSR last year already. I am interested in how the college is allocating its money.

Q: What is your position on divestment?

JENNINGS: The trustees could do more to please some groups on campus. The trustees are quite conservative and so are many students but there are students who advocate divestment and they must be taken into account. I would push for more divestment.

PHILLIPS: Divestment is a big issue on campus and I want to voice student concerns. The trustees are a pretty secret group and I would like to understand what's going on behind the scenes.

Q: What is your position on disinvestment policy?

JENNINGS: I would take it case by case and consider the Sullivan ratings. But I think that for the college, money is not scarce and is not too much of an issue relative to apartheid.

PHILLIPS: I am in favor of disinvestment advocacy. It is more important to maintain the college's holdings in order to have a voice in the policies of the companies.

Q: How effective is ACSR? Do you think that the other members take students seriously?

JENNINGS: That's hard to say since I haven't been on the committee yet. However, it depends on what kind of person you are; if you make yourself heard and come to every meeting then I think you can have an effect. You can sit back and not say too much or you can go at them.

PHILLIPS: I would imagine that the role wouldn't have a great impact, just because of the kind of money we're talking about; also, I think I'd be gauging the students' voice rather than actually making policy.

Hazardous waste found at College-owned Grundy's

by Peter Balaban

College Treasurer William Reed received a letter from the Department of Environmental Quality Engineering (DEQE) last week informing him of the college's responsibility for any damage done to natural resources by the "presence of petroleum constituents in the soil" at Grundy's garage on Water Street.

Williams purchased Grundy's late last year for $280,000 and college officials have said that the college will use it as a storage facility. According to the letter from the DEQE, Williams will also be held responsible for any necessary cleanup of the wastes.

Reed said that as part of the original purchase agreement the previous owners placed $50,000 in escrow to deal with any potential environmental problems that might arise on the site. He called the problem "relatively minor" and said the contaminated soil must be removed.

Grundy's was originally a gas station. Reed said that there is a potential problem for leakage at any site where there has been an in ground gas tank. The college commissioned IEP, Inc. of Northboro to perform a hydrogeological investigation of the site, he said. The results, which indicated that some leakage had occured, were sent to DEQE.

Stephen Joyce, Deputy Regional Environmental Engineer for DEQE, indicated in the letter that the department is reviewing the results of the IEP study and "will make a determination regarding the necessity of further investigatory or remedial work for the site at that time."

The letter said that the release and/or a threat of release of oil or hazardous materials from the site is governed by a state law called the Massachusetts Oil and Hazardous Material Release, Prevention and Response Act.

Reed said he thought Williamstown Selectman and Environmental Studies Professor Thomas Jorling's decision to withdraw support for the Grundy's purchase article at last week's special town meeting was not influenced by the discovery of the fact that Grundy's is a potential hazardous waste site. He said he thought it was purely a "political judgement" on Jorling's part.

Reed also said that the college is proceeding to make its own use of Grundy's and is assuming that the garage is not going to be purchased by the town, or at least the question of purchase "will be put on the back burner for a while" after the results of last week's special town meeting.

The college will be willing to talk to the town about the purchase of the garage in the future, he said, but "the more money we put into the garage for our own purposes, the less enthused I am about giving it up."

College pledges $35,000 to W-town landfill study

by Peter Balaban

At a special town meeting last week, Williamstown voters unanimously approved the allocation of $89,800 for a study to determine the extent of the threat that landfills in Williamstown pose to town water supplies.

Filling the elementary school gymnasium to near capacity, residents also reversed a decision by Williamstown Selectmen to conduct a $20,000 feasibility study of the current town garage on Water Street.

Also at the meeting, voters postponed indefinitely a proposal to purchase Grundy's garage on Water Street for use as the town garage. The proposal had been introduced by Selectman and Williams professor Thomas Jorling.

The special meeting was called for the purpose of approving funding for the landfill study.

Residents usually decide funding questions at the annual town meeting in May, but the landfill study involves the use of heavy equipment that cannot operate after the spring thaw, so selectmen called for the special meeting. Two articles dealing with the town garage issue were also on the agenda.

The landfill study, part of which will address violations cited by Department of Environmental Quality Engineering (DEQE), will cost $149,880.

College pledged $35,000

Williams, which owns one of the former landfill sites, has pledged to contribute $35,000 to the study. Steinerfilm Inc., a private company located on Simonds Road, has pledged to contribute $25,000.

Selectman Alan George called on residents at the meeting to pull together and head off potential disaster with the town water supply by supporting the landfill study. Voters responded by approving the measure in a unanimous voice vote.

Jorling withdrew support for his proposal to purchase Grundy's garage at the meeting and asked voters to postpone the proposal indefinitely, which they did.

Jorling supports study

Labelling the proposal "premature," he said "I don't think that the town should be ultimately asked to finance a major capital investment without a comparative study (of different potential sites)."

Jorling said after the meeting that he will support a comparative study of two or more sites to determine which will be best for use as the town garage at the May town meeting.

300 surveyed on drugs and alcohol

by Nicholas King

The Psychological Counseling Service sent questionnaires to 300 randomly selected Williams students on student drug and alcohol use.

75 students from each class were selected for the survey, which was conducted two weeks ago.

The questionaire asked students about the frequency and the quantity of their consumption of beer, wine, and liquor. It asked whether they considered themselves non, light, medium, or heavy drinkers before coming to Williams and if their drinking habits had subsequently changed.

Questions on drug use included the frequency of use and range of drugs used. There was also a true/false alchohol information quiz and a section for personal background and opinion

Director of the Psychological Counseling Service Dr. John Howland cited an interest in "knowing what the student body is doing" as the impetus for the survey.

Howland said he feels that there is an alchohol problem at Williams but that he will not know the extent of it and if there is also a drug problem until the questionaires have been analyzed.

Approximately 180 students have responded thus far for a return rate of 60%. Howland said a return rate of 20% is normal for surveys of this type.

Howland said will decide about announcing the results or instituting any special drug or alchohol related services after he evaluates the responses of the students.

Unless the survey conclusively refutes his present perceptions, Howland said that he would like to see increased student alchohol education.

He said he wants the Counseling Service to be more "proactive" reaching out to students through such devices as entry talks and a College Council committee. Howland also wants the staff and funding of the Counseling Service to be increased and a Student Health Educator hired.

Administration to scatter

by Debbie Snyder

The renovation and extension of Hopkins Hall will begin at the end of this school year and continue for at least 18 months, the Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar said.

The building costs, which include renovating the interior and adding a 1700 square foot extension, will cost approximately six million dollars, Wassenar said.

Last March, the Williamstown building inspector told the college that the top floor of Hopkins would not be certified for use as classroom space beginning September 1986, and the third floor would not be certified as of September 1987.

The addition to Hopkins will consist of 10 classrooms and offices, Wassenar said.

The administrative offices that presently occupy Hopkins will relocate in various buildings on campus. Wassenar said the president, provost and dean of the college will be in the Makepeace House in Denison Park; the offices of all other deans will be in Jenness House; the treasurer will be in Dropper House; the business offices will be on the second floor of the retail space in the Chandler Gymnasium; security will be in a trailer south of Sawyer Library.

A look back

101 years in Lasell

by Erik Burns and Beth Broadrup

Sometime during a cold January night in the early 1900's, Williams freshman James Vose shot a basket in Lasell Gymnasium. It may have been the first hoop ever scored in that soon-to-be hallowed hall, but it certainly wasn't the last.

The last regular season varsity basket netted amidst Lasell's polished wood and screaming Eph fans came during a recent Williams game. In the last few seconds of the 1986-87 season finale against Wesleyan, Dave Paulsen '87 scored two swishers from the free-throw line, nailing the Cardinals' coffin in the 74-62 blow-out. Lest he be denied his spot in the record books, Paulsen again scored the two final points in the post-season home game against Babson, Lasell's second last-game-ever.

To many, that final basket symbolizes the end of an era. Next year Eph fans won't be hanging from the rafters of Lasell, hoping that their screaming and stomping will shake the hardwood just enough to jostle the fouled Lord Jeff into yet another airball. By next year the Ephsters should be firmly ensconced in the new $14 million John W. Chandler Athletic Complex, now covered in plastic wrap.

Pillars

The "new" $50,000 Lasell Gymnasium was completed in 1886, which may explain its crowded quarters and apparent incompatibility with basketball, since the sport wasn't even invented until 1891. There were pillars, which were wrapped in padding to protect the players, several feet inside the sidelines until the gym was renovated and expanded in 1928. Lasell is the oldest gym in the country still being used for varsity athletic events. The home court advantage has allowed the men's basketball team to win 72% of their games in Lasell.

The current pool was part of the 1928 addition. An earlier 20-yard tank was located underneath the basketball court where the men's locker room is today. The swimming season had to be cancelled in 1916 because there wasn't enough water to fill the pool, and in 1918, there wasn't enough coal to heat it.

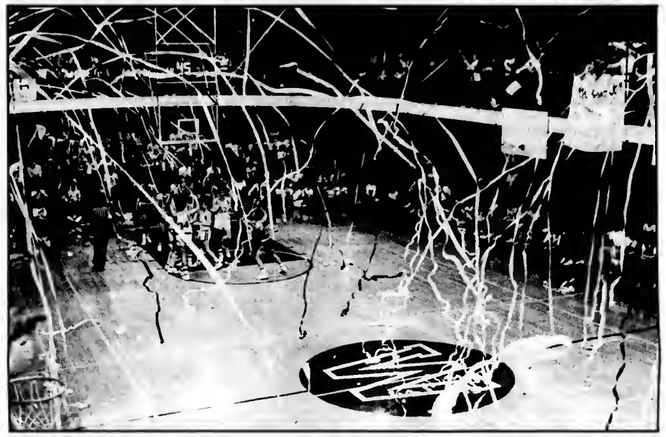
Over the years, Lasell has played host to countless athletes and coaches, many of whom now adorn its walls as serious faces in the varsity-lettered rows of old team pictures. But Lasell has given these athletes more than a space in its lobby; it has given them memories.



Robert Muir, Williams' swim coach from 1936 to 1966, said he remembers the swim teams' confrontations with Amherst as providing unfailing thrills each year. Muir led his teams to 19 championships in Lasell's pool. Muir said that his most cherished memory dates back to his retirement in 1966, when the pool was named in his honor. The new pool in Chandler will also be christened the Robert B. Muir Pool.

Conor Cruise O'Brien

by Marilyn Germano

The history department has a new member among its ranks for the spring semester. Visiting Professor Conor Cruise O'Brien has come to Williams to teach courses which treat two subjects that are of particular interest to him: the political movement of Zionism, which led to the creation of the state of Israel, and the relationship between religion and nationalism.

As his name suggests, O'Brien is from Ireland, but he is no stranger to the United States. His first visit was in 1950, when he was the managing director of the Irish News Agency, and he came here to make contacts with the American press. He visited the United States frequently throughout the rest of that decade. As a delegate to the United Nations, O'Brien found himself in America about three months out of every year.

Once the 1950's ended, he did not return again until 1965, when he came to the United States as an Albert Schweitzer Professor of Humanities at New York University, where he remained until 1969. He has held the position of visiting professor several times since then: at Berkeley in the 1970's, at Dartmouth for the 1984-85 academic year, and, finally, at Williams.

Dubliner

In spite of his travels, O'Brien said he considers Dublin his home. He said that growing up in Ireland when he did probably sparked his interest in history. When he was a young child, he explained, Ireland was a new state and there was fighting against Great Britain. Then, when he was five years old, civil war broke out in Ireland. "When you grow up in it," he said, "you wonder how it comes about."

In spite of the conflict, O'Brien chose to remain in Ireland and attended Trinity College, Dublin. His undergraduate degree is in "Modern Literature and Modern History," and he also holds a doctorate in history.

Published works

When he is not teaching, O'Brien spends a great deal of time writing. He has written a number of books; his first was published in 1952 and was a "literary criticism of the imaginative patterns in a group of Catholic writers," he said. His next venture, published in 1957, was an Irish history which dealt with Charles Parnell, the Irish nationalist leader and his party.

MassPIRG tackles state and local issues

Campus organizer Guy Staples helps students organize a meeting of the Williams MassPIRG chapter. (Kershaw)

by Mark E. Canuel

Although Williams students had attempted to organize a MassPIRG (Public Interest Research Group) chapter for several years, they did not obtain a charter until 1985. The necessary funding was finally obtained last year through a petition that about 70% of Williams students signed, according to chapter chairman Matthew McQueen. The new Williams MassPIRG chapter already has 50 to 60 members.

PIRG activities are organized primarily by the students themselves. The actual research, lobbying, and legal services are performed by paid professionals. Experts such as engineers and lawyers employed by MassPIRG recommend action on specific issues to the individual MassPIRG chapters. In addition, the students at Williams receive advice from their chapter organizer, Guy Staples. Staples is an employee of MassPIRG who advises members at Williams and Berkshire Community College, making sure that the programs are run efficiently and that the organization functions to its full potential.

MassPIRG receives no money from the College Council; its sole source of funding is a waivable three dollar fee on the semester term bill. Staples estimated that about 85% of all students paid the fee this year.

"Action-oriented"

Staples described PIRGS as "action-oriented groups" concerned with consumer and environmental interests who achieve results through legal action and community service. The past few years, Staples

Newsview 92: Williams' nightly newscast

by Michael Erard

Melissa Levine '90 and Jay Stanley '89 on the air: WCFM's Newsview 92 is broadcast weekdays at 5 p.m. (Albright)

At 3:30 p.m. every weekday, "Newsview 92," the news organization of WCFM, starts its production of that day's newscast. By 5 p.m., one day editor, one to three other people, and often the news director have culled enough news from the Associated Press wire, the Christian Science Monitor, and hourly ABC news broadcasts to assemble the news program.

On a recent Monday afternoon, day editor Harriet Honigfeld '89 and Jennifer Whichard '90 were in a side booth ripping the long sheets of AP wire releases into thin strips, a story per strip, and separating the strips into piles of regional news, financial news, sports, and national and international news.

The length of the show depends on the amount of news and how fast the news is read. "If you have a ton of stories, then you read fast," Honigfeld said.

"Do you want to know what local news is full of? Dead babies," Whichard said after reading aloud a story of a child's body being found alongside a road. "It is sensational," Honigfeld said.

Amherst

The Red Cross Northeast Blood Services recently motivated Amherst students to give blood by pitting their contributions against those of Williams students. More donors than usual turned out in the two day blood drive which was highlighted by the appearance of a "human blood drop" in dining halls to announce the need for donors. Though the drop was confused with "The Blob" and a red grape, it seems to have motivated people to do their part. Unbeknownst to us, Williams led Amherst at the outset of the blood contest by 38 percent to their 33 percent, but the 180 pints of blood collected was well over the 160 pints they needed to tie.

Brown

Amy Carter, daughter of former President Jimmy Carter, and 19 other Brown students were placed on probation last week after interrupting a trustees meeting to protest the university's investment policies in South Africa. The trustees were forced to move to another location on campus when the students walked into their meeting and refused to leave. Probation is the least possible punishment that could have been offered to the members of Students Against Apartheid, and in Amy's case will involve little more than a letter home to the former President, informing him of the infraction. Students could face expulsion or suspension for disrupting certain university functions at Brown. The probation does not reflect on a student's permanent record, but some of those punished said that they had learned their lesson anyway. (The Boston Globe)

Dartmouth

In addition to their problems with the school song "Men of Dartmouth," Dartmouth students are working to change the college's "Big Green" mascot. A student assembly committee is accepting proposals for a new mascot, which must have two-thirds of the voting students' support to be adopted. Athletic director Ted Leland noted, however, that an overwhelming degree of support would not necessarily mean adoption of a certain mascot, particularly in the case of students supporting a return to the Indian mascot which the "Big Green" replaced. The Indian was considered "inappropriate" and "divisive and unfair to a portion of the community." The student who comes up with winning proposal will receive $100.

Wesleyan

Wesleyan seniors have a new computer network to consult if they are looking for public service jobs. ACCESS, networking in the public interest, is a computerized clearing house that gives information on jobs with groups like YMCA and Oxfam America, Inc. Five schools, Wesleyan, Harvard, Yale, Cornell, and Brown, are the charter members of the network. Director Jim Clark graduated from Wesleyan last year, and got the idea for the group after being frustrated in finding leads to non-profit sector jobs. He opened an ACCESS office within a month of graduation, and now has office space at Wesleyan with paid staff members and student volunteers. By June, several more schools will have joined the program, while many others are waiting to see if it works smoothly. (The Boston Globe)

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Record reporter Michael Barsanti from material printed in other campus newspapers, unless otherwise noted.

'Portable TV' broadcast on local cable television

by F. Craig Gangi

Is commercial television getting you down? If so, then welcome to the world of Portable TV, the weekly video creation produced by students in the newly formed art department class, Video II.

Video II is being offered for the first time this semester. It is the follow-up course to Video I, which began in the fall semester of 1985. Vaughn Grylls, professor of art, decided to embark on this venture to expand the audience of the student videos. In the first course, the shows were designed to be shown to other artists only, but not to the public. "The goal is to make art that addresses itself to art in the community," explained Grylls. The show is a bit limited, though, by the fact that it must either deal with community art or stand as a work of art in itself.

In the Video II course, which meets twice a week for three hours, each of the eight students directs his or her own 15-minute program, which is shown on Berkshire Cablevision at 8 p.m. on Monday nights. Each student will be given the opportunity to direct two pieces. The content of each show is left solely up to the individual director, while ideas are tossed around for a week before videotaping begins. During the taping, the other students in the course serve as the video crew.

Steven Farley '85, the video studio technical assistant, is responsible for teaching and overseeing the use of the video and editing equipment. He described a lack of "community consciousness" in the art world. Calling Portable TV a "two-way

He has had a string of published works since then; his latest, which just appeared last summer, is entitled The Siege and recounts the saga of Israel. O'Brien's writing career has also included magazine affiliations. He has held the position of contributing editor for The Atlantic in Boston and he has been on assignment to Nicaragua and also South Africa for that magazine. The Observer of London at one time employed him as its editor-in-chief.

Homesick

O'Brien has positive comments about his visits to the United States. He and his wife, Maura, have a good many friends here, he said, and they have both enjoyed the company of O'Brien's colleagues during his various teaching spells. He explained that both he and his wife are a little homesick now, though, as their two adopted children had to remain in Ireland to prepare for exams.

What about O'Brien's perceptions of Williamstown and Williams College? Williamstown, he said, much resembles Hanover, the small town where Dartmouth is located. Other than that, he couldn't offer a definite opinion of Williamstown yet. "We're still feeling our feet here," he said. He did, however, comment that he is "looking forward to spring."

On the conflict in Ireland: "When you grow up in it, you wonder how it comes about."

Hubris

His perceptions of the College are a little more defined. He said that he is very pleased with both of the classes he is teaching here, noting that they each contain "good, bright students who are responsive in class." The students have done a fair amount of reading, he continued, and seem to enjoy the topics. He said that he is encouraged by the meetings he has had with students thus far.

What is there to be learned from history? According to O'Brien, the main lesson of history is like the main lesson of tragic drama: the avoidance of hubris, man's tendency to overreach himself and "get a swelled head when things are going well." We need to study history, he said, to steer clear of such tragic foolishness.

Lasell

graduate at Springfield College. He said he remembers the excitement he felt at coaching in the pool where he once competed and defeating his alma mater during his first coaching season.

Living history

The living history surrounding Muir Pool has a significant effect on Eph attitudes towards competition. Swim team member Robert Benson '90 said that, "since he (Muir) still goes to meets, you're kind of swimming for him."

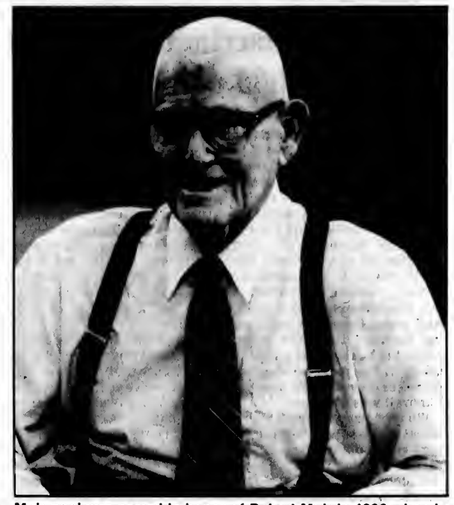
Al Shaw, retired Williams basketball coach, said that Williams "licked" Amherst 19 consecutive times during his 23 years at the helm. He took the Ephmen to a college tournament in Madison Square Garden in 1955, and can boast of having beaten Harvard more times than any other Ivy League team (during the era when Williams' opponents included Dartmouth, Harvard, Columbia and Boston College). Shaw can even recall when Harry Sheehy, the current coach's father, played for Williams during the late 1950's.

Nostalgia

How do these coaches feel about leaving the site of all this nostalgia as Williams' basketball and swim teams prepare to move into the new facility? Muir acknowledged that there is a basic problem with Lasell's pool, but said he regrets that a pool in such excellent condition cannot continue to be used. "It's a matter of room," he commented.

Samuelson said that while leaving such an historic and tradition-laden facility as Muir pool is not easy, he is truly looking forward to the move to the beautiful new Muir pool. Shaw is glad to see the new gym a reality at last; he said that in 1949 President James Phinney Baxter promised him a new gym in three years.

Lasell's future



Lasell Gymnasium has a bright, if not competitively exciting, future. According to Athletic Director Robert Peck, the main gym will remain unchanged. It will be used by physical education classes and some sports teams. The smaller gym upstairs from the Spring Street entrance will become a dance studio, outfitted with a new wood floor. Bathrooms will replace current offices on the perimeter of that space and a stairway and elevator tower will replace the current dance office.

The most radical changes will affect the pool area. The deck will be raised five feet and a two-level weight room will be located above this floor. Plans include eventually placing rowing tanks in the space below. The attic will stand empty, and the equipment room will be converted to a women's ski room. Chandler will have a new equipment room. New offices will replace Lasell's trophy room, and the basement will be remodeled.

The two gyms, old and new, will be connected in three places: through the tunnel that now leads to the squash courts, by a space between the squash courts and the new building, and by a direct indoor passageway leading through the wrestling area and squash courts, over a bridge, and into Chandler.

Crowd control

Spirit has always held a firm grip on the hearts of Williams fans, and much of that spirit has been generated by a tightly packed Lasell Gymnasium on a Williams-Amherst night. Security has had to fight almost as hard to keep the crowd size down to the maximum capacity of 1000 (600 on the floor, 400 on the raised track) as the players have to beat Amherst. It has been difficult, with desperate fans crawling like guerillas over Goodrich's lawn, through the windows and through the tunnels in order to catch a glimpse of the game and to perhaps fling a purple streamer or a well-timed "Amherst sucks!" over the rail.

Muir pool was named in honor of Robert Muir in 1966 when he retired after coaching Williams swimmers for 30 years. This January, Muir attended the last swim meet ever held in the old pool.

Freshman basketball standout Garcia Major said that he will remember the fan support in Lasell. He said that opponents would walk up to him after games and ask, "Are your fans always like that?" "I think the gym is definitely a big help to us," he concluded.

Assistant features editor Charles Samuelson also contributed to this story.

Meeting

Williamstown has been wrestling with the question of the town garage for several years.

Last June, after considering 22 sites, George, along with Selectmen J. O'Brien Locke and Henry Bratcher, decided that the current site on Water Street (which is run down and, at present, inadequate for town needs) should be rebuilt or refurbished, rather than relocating the garage.

Town garage conflict

At that time they put forth the motion to conduct a feasibility study of the current site, which was defeated at the town meeting.

Jorling and Selectman Anita Barker voted against the decision last June.

Jorling favored the purchase of Grundy's garage on Water Street and circulated a petition calling for the purchase of Grundy's and the sale of the current garage property.

The petition gained the necessary 100 signatures to be included on the agenda for the special town meeting, opposite the selectman's motion for a feasibility study of the current site.

Jorling said after the meeting that his position all along has been in favor of a comparative study, and he said that he put forth the petition to authorize a purchase of Grundy's "in an attempt to have the selectmen change their mind," but seeing that they would not do so, he decided to withdraw support.

Jorling said at the meeting that the existing site is not appropriate for the town garage because it has tremendous development potential as a commercial property and that it can be used to provide badly needed public parking in the area.

He estimated that there would be a $700,000 to $800,000 difference in cost to the town between locating the garage at Grundy's and at the current site.

Barker agreed with Jorling, and said the current site was "too small, at the center of our business district, and the wrong place to put a 50-year facility."

Bratcher and Locke have accused Jorling in the past of a conflict of interest because the college owns Grundy's. College officials have expressed a desire to purchase the current garage site, which directly abuts college land. Officials have also said that they would consider selling Grundy's to the town.

"Hazardous waste site"

Locke called Grundy's a "hazardous waste site" at the meeting, referring to the letter from the DEQE to College Treasurer William Reed, and said that the town should stay away from it -(see related story)

Locke said after the meeting that he thought Jorling's decision to withdraw support for the Grundy's purchase article was made because Jorling and Barker felt that the motion to buy Grundy's would not garner enough support at the meeting.

He added that the vote to postpone indefinitely the Grundy's purchase article indicated that public sentiment was against the purchase of Grundy's. He said he thought Jorling and Barker's ultimate goal is for the town to purchase Grundy's.

Selectmen who favor the current garage site will put forth the same article for a single site study at the annual town meeting in May, according to Locke.

He called the nine vote margin of defeat on the article calling for the single site feasibility study "inconclusive." The article was defeated 177-168 in a standing vote.

Insight on discrimination must start with light of individual

by Mike LeBauer '88

I would like to pretend that I am not a racist, but I know, deep down, my gut feelings. I know that when I recently heard of a black friend of mine having written a remarkable paper for a difficult course I am taking, my initial reaction was one of surprise. It was a purely visceral reaction, and certainly nothing I believe intellectually, but nonetheless it was there. And many layers of conditioning dictating that such things are not to be revealed served to check it. The mere recollection provokes disgust in me now, yet I know it was there.

What has caused this? Like a talent that is so polished as to be almost instinctive, such gut reactions come from practice. Not physical practice, like that by which one becomes an expert athlete, but mental practice. Years of living separately from people different from myself have ingrained such attitudes into the unconcious which could surface unintentionally at any time, such as during periods of decisionmaking. Such latent prejudices are the most insidious, for they are not visible on the surface and can work without the knowledge of their victims.

I had the misfortune of attending a small private school in the South since the first grade. During all twelve years there, I had but one black teacher; after my first day of second grade, I came home and remarked to my mother what a good tan this teacher had. There was only one black student in my graduating class. Coming from such a background, I know the meaning of segregation, of practically no exposure to individuals within a group separate from my own. I viewed blacks from a distance, and read misleading statistical generalities about the lower performances of blacks on this or that national test. It is practice like this that makes racism as automatic as walking.

The recent accusations of the BSU directed at the Williams College community, troubled me. I wondered how could this bastion of intellectual liberal thought that, while not perfect, certainly is one of the more equitable environments for cohabition of the races, so enrage its black community?

Then I realized that it is just this imperfection that is so troubling. The imperfection is this base instinct that, no matter how many layers of behavioral conditioning may mask, exists in me and certainly exists in many others. It is the tenacity of this base that must trouble the black community, for it is the most insidious.

Given recognition of the source of this racism, what should be done to combat it? It took a long time for me to develop this "talent" of racism, so reversing it also takes time. But I believe, since its creation was segregation, only integration in both a social and intellectual framework can eliminate the scourge. The BSU, while a great organization for blacks personally, where they can find understanding and companionship among other blacks, is not an effective instrument for combating this form of racism. The Cabaret in Driscoll this past Friday was a great example of how to integrate, and I congratulate the groups involved on its success. There should be more such events at Williams, not only at the instigation of the BSU, but also organized by the houses.

Most effective would be individuals recognizing their prejudices and making their own initiatives to combat them through interraction with members of other races. The black community can help whites with our problem, thus helping themselves with theirs. The only way to combat an attitude learned through experience is by countering those experiences, not by teaching about the existence of racism, and certainly not by continuing the segregation that brought about its existence. Why is it that integration is so hard?

insensitive way of saying," We don't think you have any." It is rather an appeal for the sharing of information that we who are white need if we are to modify behavior which causes pain and diminishes human dignity. Martin White writes, "You ask for specifics which can only mean people and names," and gives good reasons why these should not be given. He is right; accusations are the least useful of specifics among people learning to live together. The only usable specifics are the specifics of lived experience — that experience which White rightly tells us is the best — he says the only — proof. So we need specific, not general descriptions, of the language and actions which have had the power to offend, distress, and infuriate, so that white people can learn better what not to do and say.

One might think we should know already, but people know lots of things in general that they don't translate into specifics. It doesn't help to read in the Record that "many black students I talked to were shocked to see the Record claim that the incident which spurred the BSU's letter had nothing to do with race," if we are left with no idea of what the incident was — not who was involved in it but what was said and done. And there have been other incidents, in each of which the participants could have acted differently. To take one White describes — in very general terms: if insensitive whites can imagine they "poke fun" when calling attention to "some particularly black features," of a fellow student, they have a lot of learning to do. The specifics of what they should never have said might help them learn; if they're past help, the specifics of what they did say can certainly help others to change behavior whose power to hurt they may never before have recognized.

Change is needed — specific change. Cries of pain identify the need. Afterwards must come information and dialogue.

Trattner were declared winners. For the junior positions, Tobey Wheelock was declared a winner, while Keith McIver, Theresa Lee and Maimon Said will face each other in a run-off for the second spot.

Stuart Staley and Jonathan Hollenberg were declared winners for the Honorary Degrees committee, open only to juniors. Mark Meyer, Carolyn O'Brien, and Andy Mayer will face each other in a run-off.

Newsview

Local news means news from New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, Connecticut, or Massachusetts. Jay Stanley '89, Newsview news director, would like to include stories on Williamstown and North Adams issues rather than hard news, since covering very local stories would be next to impossible. Stanley would also like to introduce some other features to Newsview, in order to increase the appeal of the news program. His biggest idea is to get statements of analysis or opinion on national and international news from Williams faculty members.

Ripping and sorting

Monday's Newsview producers weren't worried about those changes yet (Stanley said they may not appear for another month or so), they were just concerned with that day's broadcast. For the observer, the continued ripping, taping and sorting approached chaos; one wondered how a broadcast could even strive to sound semi-professional amidst the unceremonious, untechnological procedures. But it gets done.

Someone brought in another eight-foot strip of paper from the wire machine. Whichard looked at it. "Do we have anything on prostitutes and AIDS?" she asked.

Wire service

WCFM has been hooked up to an Associated Press wire since United Press International, which provided WCFM's wire service last year, went bankrupt. According to Honigfeld, the UPI news was better because it contained indepth news stories. "They were almost perfect. You could read them," said John Basedow '89, Thursday day editor. Stanley pointed out, however, that the AP news stories, as repetitious as they are, often contain different angles on the same news. The AP news is also good for weekend disc jockeys to read.

Through a phone hook-up from WBC in Pittsfield comes the ABC News, heard hourly on WCFM. At 3:45 and 4:45 come newsworthy quotes which the Newsview producers are able to edit into their broadcast. This provides Newsview producers with an audio news source that gives a newscast an air of professionalism.

Mike check

It was almost five o'clock, and Whichard and Honigfeld have assembled their stories in the side studio. They pulled the microphones near and prepared to begin.

"Mike check? Can we have a mike check?" Whichard asked engineer John Kelsh '89. He hardly heard her, but it turned out that the listening audience did.

"I'm rarely very nervous about this, but somedays you have good days, some days you have bad days," Honigfeld said.

SAC

communicated their intention to create a party fund when they discussed it at a Housing Committee meeting at which Kenyatta was present.

"The first thing that Dean Fix said was that he found it remarkable that we had gone through with this plan without consulting them," Lapointe said. "We thought we had consulted them."

"I kept asking Hans if we should send them (the Deans) a letter, and he said all they're going to do is discuss it to death, and it's not going to work. That's why we didn't keep going back." Lapointe said.

The meeting apparently did not resolve all problems in communication between the deans and the SAC officers.

Communications gap?

"Fix gave us a choice, " Lapointe said. "He said either you abandon this plan and wait for ours or keep going and we'll shut your parties down. That's a hell of a choice."

"I did not say I'd close down parties," Fix said.

"The deans asked us to write an all-campus letter to explain why (the proposal was being withdrawn). Fix said he wanted to see it before we sent it out," Lapointe said. "After getting reamed all morning in the dean's office, we felt that we had better be nice (in the letter)."

"They volunteered (to write the letter)," Fix said.

The tone of the meeting was also interpreted differently by the people there.

"There was a fair bit of tension, " Mediratta said. "They did come down kind of hard. I think to a certain extent they might have been justified."

"It was an amicable enough meeting," Fix said.

I.M. Report

Saturday may have been the conclusion of the Ephs' basketball season, but Lasell played host to some more excitement on March 15 as the Sunday Night Championship game was held between Commissioner Rick Orluk's team and Pat O'Malley's Orangemen.

In the title game, O'Malley and Co. edged Orluk's squad 70-69 despite a furious rally led by Jim Duquette. O'Malley and Jeff Roth (25 pts.) led the Orangemen to a 35-32 halftime lead, while Harry Sheehy (20) kept Orluk's troops in the contest.

At halftime the crowd was entertained by a slam dunk contest in which Bill Melchionni defeated Dave Morrison and Roland Anglin in a scintillating final round of slams. Morrison seemed to have the edge after he vaulted a chair to rattle one home but Melchionni clinched when he first did a 360-touch-one-off-the-board slam and then a thunderous, back-scratching tomahawk dunk.

Back to game action, O'Malley's team lept to a 12 point lead but Duquette (18 2nd half points) led a rally that set up the final 30 seconds. 'Duquer' stole a pass only to have it picked clean by O'Malley who threw it away. With a chance to win the game, Oriuk missed and a last second, 20 foot prayer by teammate Rob Blanck '89 at the buzzer bounced away.

communication," Farley said that "this is one way of being able to take the community into account in the art."

The content of the show varies weekly. Alex Mankiewicz '87, who directed a recent program, described her show as a combination of comic-book and live action. It was taped on location in North Adams and in the studio, using a special effects generator.

Price Chopper

In the first broadcast that was produced by the Video II class, Williams dancers were shown dancing in the aisles of Price Chopper supermarket in North Adams. In this show, directed by Nick Levis '87, members of the community were directly involved in the video, both in some of the dance routines and in interviews asking about their reactions to the dances.

Grylls described a "sense of creative tension, a buzz" involved in each show's production, caused by the strict deadline each week. "The limits are interesting, because we have to get the show on the air," explained Grylls.

Monday nights

Future shows will give viewers a look at noted performance artist Allan Kaprow, and Richard Haas, the artist responsible for the Wallworks mural in the College Museum of Art. Hopefully, explained Grylls, the local public television station in Boston, WGBH, will broadcast an hour-long program, either airing the four best shows or clips from all of the productions.

Television major

Although Video II will not be taught next year, as Grylls will be on sabbatical, it will return in the fall semester in 1988. Since Video I is a prerequisite for Video II, Grylls recommends that interested students take that course in next year's spring semester.

If this course is successful, Grylls foresees having some type of television major, which would put together all of the various departments' courses that touch on the medium. For now, though, as Nick Levis commented, Video II "is truly an educational experience unlike any other you can really have at Williams."

said, have been filled with successes for MassPIRG, including the New Car Lemon Law, the Wetlands Wildlife Act, and the institution of appliance energy efficiency standards.

Recently, the Williams chapter supported a bill that passed in the state legislature for a Hazardous Waste Cleanup Initiative which requires an adequate disposal of all hazardous waste in the state within ten years. Last semester's projects also included a campaign against hunger and a national voter registration.

Toxic art supplies

MassPIRG members said they expect to be increasingly active in local and statewide consumer issues in the spring. One project will be to increase the evacuation radius around the Seabrook (N.H.) Nuclear Power Plant from one mile to ten. MassPIRG also hopes to draft a bill similar to one that was just passed in New York which limits the use of toxic art supplies in public schools. The organization plans to conduct research and alert the school districts to the specific supplies which contain carcinogenic substances and other harmful chemicals and urge them to purchase alternative supplies.

In order to monitor the activities of state and local legislators, MassPIRG is instituting a "State House Watch." Laura Scanlan, a MassPIRG member and organizer of the Food Cleanup Project, said that MassPIRG wants to ensure that legislators do not present bills that conflict with their previous proposals, such as the Hazardous Waste Cleanup Initiative, which needs a funding mechanism before it can be put into effect.

Food Cleanup

On the local level, MassPIRG has been involved in aiding needy families. Last semester, a giant shopping list at Price Chopper Supermarket urged customers to contribute food to a hunger project that Scanlan described as "immensely successful." On April 25th, students involved in the Food Cleanup Project will each spend about three hours cleaning up parks, playgrounds and other areas in return for a charitable donation. Half of the money will be donated to USA for Africa, half will be donated to the Berkshire Food Project, an organization in North Adams that serves meals to needy families twice a week.

According to Staples, the issues MassPIRG may address in the future include daycare, a used car lemon bill, and a solid waste management reasearch bill.

Framingham falls to Ephs in title game

John Ciulla '87 epitomized this Eph performance. The senior had lost much of his playing time recently in the Ephs' up-tempo game, but scorched the Rams in his final game. Entering the game in the middle of the first half with Williams leading 17-16, Ciulla became a zone-buster, hitting nothing but the bottom of the net with five jumpers, including two treys, for a quick 12 points as the Ephs erupted on a 21-5 run.

However, Marvin Sutson of Framingham burned Williams for 10 points in the final four minutes to pull the Rams within 48-41 at intermission. Coach Harry Sheehy nonetheless thought the Ephs "were in good shape considering who was on the bench." Indeed, Johnson (2 fouls), Lang and Major all sat out the final portion of the half.

The second half was a long and unsuccessful comeback attempt by the homestanders, as Williams' lead wavered between four and ten points the entire way. The Rams got within six with 16:20 remaining, but Jones buried a three-pointer; the Rams closed to 70-64, but Jones nailed a jumper. At 76-71, Melchionni got a lucky bounce on a jumper to pad the lead to seven and then hit Johnson inside for a 80-71 advantage.

The telling play occurred at 1:30 remaining. Down five, Gerry Walsh for Framingham drove the lane, but was rejected by Johnson as the ball flew downcourt to a streaking Melchionni who was hacked on the layup attempt. The soph hit both freebies to push the lead to 91-84. Then, as Framington desperately pressed fullcourt, Jones got behind the defense for two easy hoops as Williams closed out the sweet win 98-87.

The Ephs were understandably estatic about the tournament crown. For the seniors, it is a cap to a great four years under Sheehy. Johnson noted the play of classmate Ciulla, who "was on fire. It's great to see John go out like that." Lang, celebrating his birthday one day early with the win, said that "we knew we had a good chance once we got into the playoffs."

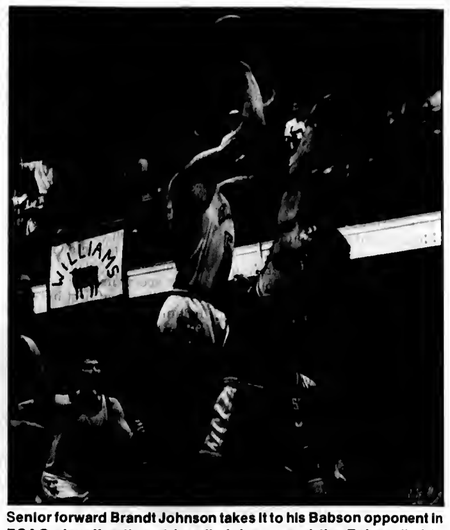
For those who will return next year, the championship was a challenge to repeat again next year. Major, whose entry into the program gave the Ephs the floor leader and scorer to replace Tim Walsh '86, exclaimed that "I couldn't ask to start my career any other way."

Sheehy commented on the team's blown first-half lead, saying, "I don't start to get worried until we get up by 10 (with the three-point shot and shot clock)." He said the team did an outstanding job in the tourney in learning and executing game plans specifically designed for each opponent.

Amherst blown away

Wednesday's game against top-seeded Amherst showed how much the Ephs have matured throughout the campaign. When the Little Three rivals met in January, Amherst dominated, confusing and outhustling Williams in a 88-75 win. In the rematch, the Ephs jumped out to huge second-half lead, only to see a Jeff comeback close the game to a 73-68 Eph win that left some doubt to who was the better team.

This time, there would be no doubt. Before a packed LeFrak crowd, Johnson went beserk in the opening moments, scoring 15 points as Williams took a 32-20 lead. A quick 12-0 Jeff run tied matters, but Williams eased out to a 43-36 halftime lead on a Jones' trolka at the buzzer.



In the second half, Amherst closed the margin to 56-53 without the services of All-New England Yram Groff, who had picked up three first half fouls. His fourth came at 11:37, and his fifth at 9:52, and he went to catch splinters on the pine, having scored only four points.

From a 58-55 score, Williams mauled the Jeffs with a 17-1 run. As the large Williams contingent of fans roared, the lead was eventually stretched to 19 at 75-56 before the 20-5 Amherst squad reeled off seven quick points to pull within 12 with 3:40 left. But with 2:29 remaining, Melchionni went baseline, got hacked and tossed in a rainbow banker and then converted the free throw to effectively end the game. Amherst comebacks were useless, and Jones sealed the win with two free throws and a hoop, the final score resting at 89-75.

Scoring leaders for Williams were Johnson with 30 points to go along with his 15 rebounds, Jones with 27 and Masters with 13 and seven assists. Said Johnson before the Framingham game, "This is the biggest game of my career." Sheehy, looking at the All-NE team said, "It's a crime that Brandt didn't make it."

Next year

The team will lose inside workhorses Johnson and Lang as well as backcourt personnel Ciulla and Dave Paulsen to graduation. These losses are severe. However, with a sterling backcourt of Major and Jones, strong wingmen in Masters and Melchionni, maturation of frontcourt backups like Dave Morrison '90 and Doug Phillips '88 and an expected strong recruiting class, there seems no reason to think that the Ephs have made their last trip to the ECAC title circle.

Senior forward Brandt Johnson takes it to his Babson opponent in ECAC playoff action at Lasell. Johnson and the Ephs rolled to victories over the Beavers, Amherst, and Framingham to capture the title. (Camp)

by Al Mottur and Stewart Verdery

Since the inception of this column, we have targeted our criticism at SMU's football violations and professor Kurt Tauber's proposal to eliminate interscholastic athletics at Williams. We have argued over who is the best player in the NBA and prognosticated our NCAA picks. This week all we have is praise. Praise for the Williams men's basketball team and its much deserved ECAC championship title.

With their win over Framingham State on Saturday night, the Ephs did something no Williams basketball team had ever done before — win an ECAC championship. And this achievement is all the more remarkable considering that the squad had to play two of its three playoff games on the road, and before the season was expected to have difficulty after the loss of All-New England point guard Tim Walsh.

The squad managed to wade through an early season schedule that included NCAA playoff teams Norwich and North Adams State and a humiliating 41 point loss to Hamilton. Then the squad was beaten rather handily by the Jeffs of Amherst to lower the Ephs record to 3-3.

At this point the squad began to jell as freshman Garcia Major was given full control of the offense. His ability to run the fast break and outside shooting meant several things for Coach Harry Sheehy's squad. One, Henry Jones '88 was freed to off-guard, where his deadly shooting was most effective down the stretch, including 70 points in the three ECAC games. Two, Major proved adept at feeding seniors Brandt Johnson and Greg Lang inside, raising shooting percentages and opening up driving lanes for forwards Mike Masters and Bill Melchionni.

One other aspect of the move was that former starter John Ciulla saw a reduction of playing time. The senior averaged 13 points a game year ago, but was phased out of the transition style-offense employed late in the year. However, the senior remained ready and was given a chance to shine in the title game. When Framingham dropped into a zone defense in the first half, Ciulla bombed away, nailing five hoops, including two from three-point territory, for 12 points. Even though he did not play in the second half, Ciulla was a major reason for the dismantling of Framingham.

After the first Amherst loss, the Ephs went 14-4, including winning streaks of five and four games. The success was due to a balanced mode of play. Unlike last year, when the squad faded to a 12-11 record and all the offense centered around Walsh, the 1986-87 Ephs had no superstar. Each game a new player would be the hero, whether it was Major with 33 against Babson, or Jones with the awesome playoffs, or Johnson with 30 points versus Amherst in the ECAC's, or Lang with 13 rebounds against the Jeffs, or Masters or Melchionni...

Congrats to the Ephs, ECAC champs!

Williams laxmen take on an Amherst stickster in previous campaign's action. The lax team is defending its Little Three crown this year and hopes to improve on last spring's 8-4 record.

Laxmen set to begin Little 3 title defense

by Marc McDermott

When a lacrosse coach loses an All-American goalie, yet still expects to finish as well or better than last year, he must have confidence in his returning players. Coach Renzie Lamb knows it will be hard to replace attackman Chris Toti, goalie Brandt DuPont and outstanding defenseman Dickie Wiles, but he is counting on his returning lettermen and some key recruits to lead his team to a banner season.

From last year's 8-4 Little Three champions returns senior tri-captains Mike O'Connell '87, Taylor Watts '87, and Jaimie Gallup '87. O'Connell led the Ephs in scoring last year with 44 total points and is expected to pace a strong attack with help from seniors Steve Patterson and Jim Sperry. Lamb hopes freshman Bobby Santry will step in immediately to round out the attack along with Stu Staley '88 and Lou Fisher '89.

Gallup and Watts lead a defense that returns intact from last year and features All-New England senior Dave Crompton. Eric Churchill '87 and Dan McCarthy '87 will also figure prominently along with sophomore Kaveh Khosrowshai and an outstanding group of freshman.

Lamb expects his middies to be a lot stronger this year with the maturity of his upperclassmen and a large influx of freshmen. All-New England Rob Miller '87 will lead a starting midfield of Chris Oldham '88 and Doug Gilbert '89. The return of junior Chris Swindel from knee surgery and John Edie from a foot injury will fill out a strong midfield. Strong freshmen recruits in this area include Tim Oliver, Ed Anderson, Dan Calishman and Steve Linen.

Replacing DuPont in goal will be junior Dana Weeder and freshman Rob Lambert. Lamb has confidence in both players' abilities to replace DuPont saying, "Robby comes with great credentials from high school, and Dana did a great job last year as backup. Both are excellent goalies."

O'Connell echoed Lamb's optimism: "We did so well last year that teams will be more ready for us than they were. We'll be better, but it will come down to how well we prepare for the big games. I think we'll go as far if not farther than last year."

Lamb believes his team has the potential to surpass last year's second round New England tournament loss to Middlebury, the eventual ECAC champion. "The defense is good, the middie more mature, and the attack strong. The key is in goal, but I don't see any problem there. Our captains have done a great job getting us ready and expectations are high."

11-game southern slate

Baseball to rely on powerful offense

by Stewart Verdery

The Williams' baseball team enters the 1987 campaign with a great deal of optimism following last year's sterling 19-11 season. While a large portion of the pitching staff has graduated, the Ephs return seven starters from a powerful offensive attack that averaged almost eight runs a game a year ago.

The club journeys Friday to Georgia and Florida for the annual southern trip, an 11-game, 11-day odyssey through Savannah, Clearwater and Lakeland. The schedule is a formidable one, including Division II powerhouse Florida Southern, two games against Armstrong State, and three versus the University of Illinois-Chicago. The squad will then return north for the remainder of its 30-game schedule.

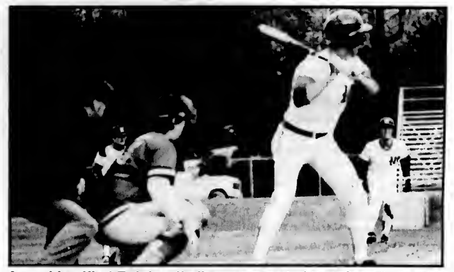
Batting barrage

The offensive attack will lack no firepower in 1987, as the Ephs return their top seven average-hitting batters from a team that compiled an overall .353 mark in 1986. Leadoff man Jim Duquette '88 hit .465 a year ago, stole a team-leading 16 bases, led the team in runs, doubles and walks and was named to the Division III New England All-Stars last May. Juniors Lew Collins (.367, 26 RBI), Chris Pacchus (.408, 25 RBI), Rick Hedeman (.394, .644 slugging percentage) and seniors Steve Beisito (.349, 18 RBI) and captain John Shaw (.400, six game-winners) will form a 'Murderer's Row' for Coach Jim Briggs.

Throw in returnees Sean Logan '88 and Chris Donato '89 and quality newcomers like transfer Scott Kennedy '89, Brad Bryan '87 and freshmen Brian Harwell, Billy Schwartz, Bob Verhey and Todd Strieter, and it is clear that the Ephs will have no trouble putting runs on the board as they move to their temporary home on Cole Field.

Defensive shifting

In the field, a number of Ephs may find themselves in new places. With the loss of second baseman Rob Coakley '86 (6 HR), Beisito will likely shift back to second to play the position he toiled at in 1985. In his place at third will be Pacchus, who served almost exclusively as designated hitter last year. Shaw, who served as catcher in 1986, will see some time in his old home of the outfield after the graduations of starters Jeff Lilley '86 and Dickie Hollington '86.



During the game of musical positions, Duquette will move from left field to center at times. Holding down spots on the defensive spectrum will be shortstop Collins, and first baseman Hedeman. Donato, Harwell and Shaw will split the catching duties.

The biggest worry for Coaches Briggs and Cari Boetze is filling the graduation losses of the pitching staff. Now-departed Kevin Morris, Pieter Muider and Bob Hussey combined for 14 wins and 59% of the innings pitched. However, much talent returns. Probable starters include Scott Garfield '88, Bill Ryan '88 and Chris Conway '89.

Garfield was 3-2 in '86, and the tall righthander was very effective after surviving the opening innings. Ryan saw limited duty last year, but compiled an impressive 3.85 ERA. Conway, who is trying to shrug off a lingering arm problem, rebounded from a tough southern trip last year to pitch two fine games against Bates and Amherst.

Seth Lawry '87 led the Ephs in ERA last year at 2.45, and will likely be used as a long relief man or an occasional starter. Mike Barbera '89 was used as a left-handed stopper in '86 and responded with a win and two saves. Since the starters are relatively untested, the relief core, which also includes hard-throwing Rob Blanck '89 and David Johnson '88, will be crucial, especially early in the year.

The Ephs barely missed both the Little Three title and an ECAC playoff berth a year ago, and neither would be unrealistic goals this season.

An unidentified Eph hardballer prepares to hit as Sean Logan '88 comes down the line in action last year. The squad looks to improve on its 19-11 mark of last spring and gain an ECAC playoff berth. (Khakee)

Skiers challenge Anchorage slopes

Parisien eleventh in giant slalom
Three skiers honored as All-East

by Steve Brody

Members of both the Nordic and Alpine ski teams traveled to Anchorage, Alaska last week to compete in the NCAA Championships. In addition, honors from the Eastern Regionals were received the previous weekend at Middlebury.

Two women competed for the Nordic team. Kathy Wolf '88 skied a strong race to take 20th in the ten-kilometer race. Kirsten Froburg '90 also skied well, taking 32nd in 34:02. "I had a pretty good race," said Froburg, "but it's tough when you're going up against the best in the country."

On the alpine slopes, three women and two men competed for Williams. Donna MacDonald '87 was a victim of two falls. The first, in the first run of the giant slalom, was caused when her bindings became unfastened. After a good run that put her in 20th place after the first run of the slalom, MacDonald's knee blew out in the second run and she was unable to finish. Mari Omland '89 and Amy Duncombe '89 both skied well for the Ephs. Omland took 20th in the slalom and 26th in the giant slalom, while Duncombe captured 28th and 32nd, respectively.

For the men, freshmen Lindon Seed and J.P. Parisien made the journey to Anchorage. Seed slid on his side in the first run of the giant slalom, but recovered to place 19th after the first run. However, he fell on the second run and did not finish. Parisien, on the other hand, excelled in the GS. He had two good runs to take 11th place against the top competition. He took 20th in the slalom.

Seed, in the slalom, found himself in 10th place after the first run. However, he did not fare as well on the second. "I was having one of the best runs of my life," he said, "and I fell at the fourth-to-last gate." Even with the fall, had he not missed a gate, the freshman would have finished seventh.

The previous weekend at the Eastern Regionals at Middlebury, both the men's and women's teams captured fourth place. In addition, the All-East teams were announced. Kathy Wolf was honored with a place on the nordic first team. For the alpine skiers, Seed and Parisien were given second-team honors.

Winston Chang '89 skies for a spike against the Lord Jeffs of Amherst in volleyball action on Saturday. The Eph netters were trailing two games to nothing before a fierce rally sparked them to three consecutive game wins and a match victory over the hated Lord Jeffs. Earlier in the year, Williams downed Amherst 3-1. (LeBauer)

VOL. 100, NO. 20 USPA 684-680 WILLIAMS COLLEGE APRIL 14, 1987

Other colleges' rules

The Record obtained party policies from other colleges whose size and social lives are similar to those of Williams in order to compare Williams' new party policy to others. Excerpts follow.

Amherst

"The sponsor of a party may be held legally liable for the actions of his/her guests, if the guests were under the legal drinking age and were served alcohol at the event, or if the guests were served alcohol while being obviously intoxicated."

"Every party at which alcohol is served must have Amherst College students who are of legal drinking age doing the bartending and checking identification."

"College collected student activities and social fees and other College funds may not be allocated for the purchase of alcohol. While guests of any age may attend a party, only those who are 21 years of age or older may be served alcohol. All party sponsors must employ an approved procedure to identify underage persons (hand stamps, wrist bands, etc.) and ensure that alcoholic beverages ore not served to such persons."

Colby

"Only establishments with State of Maine liquor licenses may sell alcohol. (This law makes it very difficult for organizations on campus to finance events that include alcohol.)"

"This law (The Little Dram Act) makes the person seving the alcohol liable under civil law if an intoxicated person is injured as a result of alcohol consumed. Since organizations at Colby are a part of Colby, it is possible that Colby College would also be named in such a suit, as well as any person who approved such an event."

"Alcohol is prohibited at any social event designed primarily for freshmen and/or sophomores. Because the legal drinking age in Maine is 21 and since most freshmen and sophomores are under age, events designed specifically for them cannot include alcohol."

Dartmouth

"Consumption of alcoholic beverages is prohibited on the Green; during intercolegiate, club or intramural athletic events — wherever they are held, whether on or off the Dartmouth campus; and in the vicinity of the river in conjunction with water-related activities."

"Use of College funds for the purchase of alcoholic beverages to be served to individuals less than twenty-one years old is prohibited."

"Individuals who sponsor an event, by signing the Registration Form, will be responsible for behavior at the event."

New party policy limits kegs

by Debbie Snyder

The college's new party policy emphasizes the responsbility of students, not the college, to decide for themselves whether or not they will observe Massachussetts laws regarding the consumption of alcohol.

The policy, which was distributed to students at the end of spring break, focuses on individual responsibility to the law and the promotion of moderate drinking at medium-sized parties. Absent from the policy are college regulations explicitly forbidding the consumption of alcohol by underage students.

"What we are saying is you are adults, this is the law, you make your decision," Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta said. "To take more responsibility for student behavior, that goes fundamentally against all we are trying to do."

The administration began to revise the party policy after Massachusetts law changed in the summer of 1985, raising the drinking age to 21 and making hosts liable for intoxicated guests.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) wrote a report last year suggesting changes in the college's party policy. Kenyatta said the report was largely ignored.

The administration stepped up its efforts to produce a new policy after the police came on campus twice last fall and arrested Donald Aselton '88, then-president of Club Bacchus, and Ajata Mediratta '87, president of Armstrong house. These students were held responsible for parties sponsored by their respective organizations.

"There was minimal work done on it last year, but we realized we could not let it go any longer," Kenyatta said. "We don't like the town police getting involved."

The deans and members of security began meeting regularly last fall to formulate a pol-

Trustees meet freshmen, council officers

by Lisa Nahf

Racial tension, campus life, tuition increases and the renovation of Hopkins Hall dominated discussion at the meetings of the members of the Board of Trustees, according to College Treasurer William Reed, who is secretary to the Trustees.

The Trustees, who were in Williamstown from Thursday to Saturday, met with student groups including the new College Council officers and a group of freshmen.

The Committee on Campus Life met with various student groups to discuss the issue of racial tension. "The Trustees wanted to know where Williams fit into the national problem," Reed said. "They wanted to focus on the Williams experience — what obligations we have, and the position and attitudes the students leave Williams with."

The Trustees examined the role of affirmative action in Williams' hiring policy. "The Trustees were astounded by figures of the composition of the faculty," College Council President Carter Zinn said. "After we had read the figures to them they asked to see them again."

The Council had presented the figures in its proposal for broadening the eligibility requirements for the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP). "The Trustees were in support of our proposal to open up the membership of the CAP to all tenured professors," Zinn said.

On the more general issue of racial tension, the Council and the Trustees discussed the lack of a established committee to act as a unified and objective forum for racial grievances.

Said Zinn of the Council's meeting with the Trustees, "They had an abundance of interest and ideas. They have a legitimate concern over what is going on, what the trends are, and what happens on a one to one level."

In other business, a 7.5 percent tuition increase was approved for the 1987-88 academic year, bringing tuition up to $11,700 dollars with housing at $1,550 and board at $2,180.

"Where we stand right now is comparable to other similar institutions. Once again the Board reaffirmed its commitment to be aid-blind in admissions decisions," Reed said.

The Trustees voted to proceed with the renovation and addition to Hopkins Hall. Estimated cost of the project is 6.9 million dollars, with 1.2 million needed to divert and rewire the steam tunnel which presently runs directly through the basement.

For the first time the Committee on Campus Life spoke with a group of 8 Freshmen to discuss their impressions of Williams and the Freshman year. They discussed the Freshman Resi-

Police recover goods stolen from Armstrong

by F. Craig Gangl

During Spring Break, two New Ashford youths were arrested and charged with larceny from a building and possession of stolen property, Williamstown police said.

The two allegedly broke into a room in Armstrong House March 14 and stole almost $900 in audio equipment from both the house and individual students, according to Williams College Director of Security Ransom Jenks.

The two minors charged were released to their parents' custody. Their cases will be handled through the Juvenile Branch of Berkshire County Criminal Court in North Adams.

Jenks said Officer Vincent Zolto and the Williamstown Police arrested the two during the break.

Ajata Mediratta '87, president of Armstrong House, said he awoke in the middle of the night to find two youths with his suite stereo and the house stereo. After security was notified, a report was filed with the Williamstown Police Department.

Mark Raisbeck '88, who also lives in Armstrong House, said that a receiver, one speaker, a turntable, and an equalizer were taken that night from his living room along with a tape deck owned by Mediratta and a receiver and two speakers which were on the house landing.

According to Raisbeck, the police have recovered his turntable and the house receiver and are in the process of recovering more.

Mediratta said that he would cooperate with the police in the prosecution of any of the suspects. "It seems that the kids have been systematically ripping us off and setting us up," he said.

Jenks took the opportunity to thank the Williamstown Police Department, especially Zolto, who he said was instrumental in solving the case. "It tells the whole world that they are working for our welfare," said Jenks.

He also used the opportunity to reaffirm his support for automatic locks on the outside of buildings. "I think this will help particularly because students are averse to locking their room doors, " said Jenks.

He said there has been approximately $6200 in larceny on the campus since the start of the academic year. Jenks said that with the added security of door locks, this number would be kept lower.

The cost of an automatic lock system would be substantial, Jenks said. With 41 buildings to be put on the system, some with multiple entrances, it would represent a serious financial commitment by the college, he said.

The Williams Record

A flaw in the policy

The party policy released by the deans' office last week ends a period of uncertainty about the Williams social scene since the Massachusetts drinking age rose to 21 in the summer of 1985.

During that period, the college's policies on parties changed gradually, but significantly.

The first and most obvious change was the change in atmosphere at the Log. Next came changes in party policy, such as the reinterpretation of existing rules so as to prohibit parties with alcohol in freshman entries.

All along, however, there has been a general understanding that a larger review of college alcohol policies was necessary in light of the new laws. Accelerating after several highly visible student arrests this fall, the process of constructing a comprehensive revised party policy has finally come to a conclusion with this month's statement.

In many respects, the new policies are similar to those they replace. An area of significant change, however, promises to be the imposition of keg limits. Such limits are presumably intended to limit the size of large parties, and concurrently encourage a proliferation of smaller ones. But the keg limits set by the new policy will tend to discourage, rather than encourage, small parties.

By forbidding the presence of kegs at small, suite-size parties of less than 20 people, the College's policy has significantly increased the cost of sponsoring such a party. Bottled and canned beer simply costs too much to supply on any large scale.

Presumably the college wants to limit the amount of alcohol consumed by a relatively small number of people at suite parties. Such a limit involves an implicit value judgement as to what constitutes too much alcohol.

The college denies that the policy is meant to include any such judgements; indeed, it is founded, say administrators, on a precept of student reponsibility for their own actions — including alcohol consumption.

The limit, therefore, displays a two-fold flaw in logic.

First, the deans are working against their goal of reducing the number of very large parties by making small parties comparatively more expensive to sponsor. Second, they are making the kind of moral judgement on "responsible drinking" that the core of the new policy rejects.

The college should roll back the prohibition of kegs in suite parties, and it should do it immediately — rather than during the appointed policy reveiw next January.

THE FAR SIDE By GARY LARSON

"Well, Frank's hoping for a male and I'd like a little female. . . . But, really, we'll both be content if it just has six eyes and eight legs."

Long day's journey into spring break: where did the time go?

by Nat McCormick '88

I had this dream the other night....

I was sitting at lunch one day with two normally rational students who began a heated debate on one of the more burning issues of our time — whether or not cows had horns. The answer seemed simple when immediate evidence provided only the College mascot or the side of a milk carton, but the consideration of breeds other than Jerseys, Guernseys, or Hoods might have found one without horns. In fact, one of these master debaters was willing to steak a sixpack on that suspicion. The other accepted, and at that point, I had to butt in and ask how on earth they intended to resolve the issue. The combination of their looks, along with a half-digested hamburger, gave me heartburn.

Soon, Spring Break arrived and they departed South, to pass the days (they explained) assiduously calculating optimal UV angles in order to determine solar radiation capacities. I, too, headed South, with an equally academic goal. My final destination was a tiny town called Oerdahei, in the minute province of Oadtafuq, where, rumor had it, could be found the only breed of horniess cow known to man or Letterman. Accompanying me was an orphan I had picked up at one of the many custom stops, who had gained my respect by persuading the officials after a lengthy explanation in the local dialect not to confuse Williams with the College in Virginia.

"Time's a little short 'round here, kid," I said. "Let's get going."

"O.K., Mr. Jones." The kid never did get my name right, but he was good with languages.

We followed dangerous roads for hours in our rent-a-heap, stopping every now or then to clean the bugs from the windshield and play Monopoly at the local canteena. The only other sign of civilization appeared in the form of a pick-up truck with American plates which flew past with a flurry of epithets and beer bottles. We were relieved to read on the license plate that we had a friend in Pennsylvania.

Somewhere south of the border, the road stopped and we started trekking through a dense jungle. After an hour or so, I suddenly felt a tug on my sleeve. "Mr. Jones, look!"

I lifted my official Top Gun glasses, and saw, grazing in a clearing, a sight that took my breath away. I made sure my equipment was loaded and raised it to shoot. All of a sudden, the horniess hoofer bolted, and within seconds, we were surrounded by a group of natives, who took my camera and silently herded us along until we came to a small town on the edge of a vast beach. There, we were brought before a wrinkled man who addressed us in a stream of indignant tongue clickings. I shrugged, but the kid answered him in the same language.

The elder shook his head. "That bull. Click-picture steal soul. You must be punish."

We spent the night locked in a hut with ina dequate plumbing and large hairy spiders. At dawn, we waited on the beach until the blazing sun rose and a jury of natives, painted with colored zinc oxide, pronounced our sentence: "All day in sun ... no swim, no drink, no clothes." The situation looked desperate.

After an hour, the no-longer-pale kid made a plea to the elder, seated in the shade of a palm. "But mister, Mr. Jones from Indiana!"

The elder spilled his cocktail and stood slowly. "Indiana?" he asked incredulously."Indiana? You play the hoop?"

The kid told another lie for me. I knew nothing about the game. "Of course. You never hear of Basketball Jones?"

The wrinkled face echoed his smile all the way back to his ears. At his motion, we were escorted back to the largest hut in town, inside of which, believe it or not, our horniess cow was grazing under a wide-screen TV.

The elder had the remote control. "You like Hoosiers?"

"Who?" I asked.

"Moo," said the cow.

When the TV lit up, four muscular men staggered in with a massive golden box. My eyes widened. "What's in there?"

The elder took a bottle opener from around his neck. "Brew," he said.

Just as things were looking up, I found myself looking up at the library ceiling. The dream had ended, and I still had no documentation of a horniess cow. But I'll tell my friends where to check.

Students do not understand purpose of Record reporting

Writing this column I decided before spring break to write a piece that directed criticism towards people and groups at Williams which I believed deserved the attention.

People were surprised. Friends wondered if I was angry at the athletic department or the SAC. After a note appeared in the Daily Advisor calling for a new Athletic Director, a few people actually asked me if I submitted it.

Another Word
by Andrew Mayer

This reaction is perplexing but understandable. I am not sure anymore of the reception the Record receives on campus.

I worry that readers perceive the Record as simply a group of students who, in addition to providing news and sports coverage, also give their opinion on campus issues.

I worry that these opinions are considered self-serving or biased.

I worry that students do not consider the Record actual journalisim, but a Williams student paper which only prints positive material about our college.

Above all, I worry that students don't take us seriously enough.

My reaction does not stem only from reaction to my last column, but has built up in the two years I have written for the Record. Two other examples come to mind.

First, I distinctly remember student reaction to an article I wrote in the fall of 1985 about a Williams student, since graduated, who was accused of biting a North Adams man's nose off. My editors and I felt it was the responsibility of the Record to report the arrest, just as the Record reported another student's arrest this past fall.

However, I was bombarded with phone calls on the night this paper came out and people told me that I had ruined the student's life by printing that information. They argued that he would forever be stigmatized at such a small college as Williams.

Second, the Record editors this Spring, for the first time I can recall, considered supporting candidates in the just-completed College Council elections. They decided against it.

I disagreed with my editors and I wanted to support a candidate in my column. After talking with that candidate about the support, he urged me not to do so.

The candidate believed that any support from me would be perceived as a writer using his column to advertise for a friend. He worried that votes might actually be lost.

The first situation provides a great example of what I mean when I say the the Record should not become a publicity banner for Williams College. The news coverage should be fair and unbiased, but also all-encompassing.

If something happens on campus, I believe it should be covered in the Record. The same goes for my column, any column, or the Record editorial; if we believe something needs comment, we should get on it.

There are exceptions, such as personal matters which have no bearing on the community (e.g., drunk driving arrests of students). Yet when something like the nose-biting affair affects our relationship with the neighboring town, it should be printed.

The second example points to the student perception of the Record. I do not want it to be thought that if I support someone I do so because he is my friend, and that if I write an editorial against someone, that I hate him.

As a columnist I am unbiased. In a manner of speaking we have no feelings. I am obligated to call things as I see them. Support of a candidate or nomination should be viewed as would support or criticism for a new campus policy. If a reader disagrees with an opinion, I encourage he/she to respond in a letter or an editorial.

In short, the Record is not meant to be news and editorials written by Williams students to glorify Williams and here and there touch on controversial issues. This is not a PTA news bulletin. The Record is journalistic work and should be viewed as such.

The twin faces of deception on democracy and South America

by John Canty '88

The Pope's recent trip to South America, and his warm reception there, has in the past few days caught the world's attention. As if to demonstrate the power of spirituality which transcends the might of the state ("How many divisions does the Pope have?" Stalin is said to have asked.), John Paul II in Chile upheld the dignity of the individual, the primacy of human rights all of us share as 'children of the Light.' As he leaves South America, so does he remind us that this area of the world, which we have so long neglected, must claim an ever-greater share of our attentions. As never before, we must realize the fate of our ideals to be inextricably bound with that of our neighbors in the Americas.

The Pope's insistence on human rights, and the importance they should hold in American foreign policy, brings into sharp focus an American debate which, more than any debt crisis, threatens the contribution which the United States can offer. Two visions of our role in South America vie, one conservative, one liberal, but both dangerously common. Together they threaten the nature of our democratic commitment to self-determination at a critical time when we are called to decide the extent of American support for such fledgling democracies as Argentina and El Salvador and the nature of our opposition to the repressive regimes of Chile and Nicaragua.

It is well that the Pope began his trip in Chile. As that proud nation strives again for the keys to its own future, we witness American conservatives brazenly excuse the brutal repression of Gen. Pinochet as a justifiable, if unpleasant, state. Repression and the desecration of freedom can be pardonable, some conservatives argue, if only to avert the assumption of power by Marxist rebels. Though other conservatives, like Jeanne Kirkpatrick, would point to Brazil or Argentina as examples of right-wing authoritarians begetting governments of self-determination, this school of thought cares not at all for the daily denial of liberty to worship, to write, to dissent.

If we are to hold freedom sacred at home, we must, too, abroad. We cannot allow our policies to be framed according to the narrow dictates of exclusive anticommunism.

The Pope did not visit Nicaragua; yet it is in our perception of this country that we behold the other specter that haunts the debate. American supporters of the Sandinista regime have entered into a conspiracy of silence on the increasingly evident totalitarian nature of that government. Their voices fall quiet as the last opposition newspaper, La Prensa, is closed by the government, they turn quickly to the next page when the New York Times reports on the Sandinistas' intimidation of a Nicaraguan mothers' organization which seeks to find their imprisoned sons' whereabouts, they advocate a policy of 'appeasement at any price' as shameful and misconceived as that espoused by Neville Chamberlain. Much of this code of silence owes to a feeling of guilt for harboring sympathies, for romanticizing Fidel Castro, who is proving as skilled at torture and repression as Gen. Pinochet.

As different as these two bodies of thought are, they make common cause in preaching nonintervention in other nations' affairs. They agree that the United States has no right to meddle in the affairs of regimes with which we find ourself in disagreement. They especially agree that we cannot apply our democratic beliefs everywhere, that our morality should be relative. Theirs are the voices in the night speaking for inaction, for irresolution, for weakness.

If the testimony rendered at such personal cost by Jacobo Timerman of Brazil and of Armando Valdares of Cuba has worth at all, it lies in the essential truth that ours is a society profoundly committed to the fulfillment of the human spirit, of the individual's dignity under God. In the respect American institutions do have for dissent, for essential rights, for the respect the individual demands, we do have much to offer the world. We should not be ashamed of this. And we should not be deceived into the chic notion that freedom and human rights know borders; its relevance is and must be universal. Totalitarianism represents the greatest threat to the free mind in the twentieth century; how morally abhorrent must a totalitarian government be, with what arrogance must it treat its citizens, before we aid our brothers?

We must hold to a national commitment to aid those free peoples embarked on their own paths of self-determination, we must sacrifice for them, but first we must see in those principles their universal truth.

Freshmen arrested for fake ID's

Two Freshmen were arraign-ed in Northern Berkshire District Court last Wednesday on charges of forgery and aiding in forgery.

Geoffrey Beard '90, who was arrested by Williamstown police last Monday on a warrant for not paying a fine incurred last September for being under-age and transporting alcohol.

Police found fake I.d.'s on Beard when they conducted the custodial search required of someone who is arrested, Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zoito said.

"When you look at three of them (i.d.'s) and you find three different dates on them and evi-dence of different states, you know they're fake," Zoito said.

Beard was charged with three counts of forging a driver's license, one count of forging an official document, three counts of possessing a forged driver's license, and one count of pos-sessing a forged document.

William Murphy '90 was arrested after the police inter-rogated Beard. "By talking and interrogating one suspect the investigators led to another one and I don't think this closes the door totally," Zoito said.

Murphy was charged with two counts of aiding in the forgery of a driver's license and one count of aiding in forgery of an official document.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix and Dean of Freshmen Robert Kavanaugh went to the police station and talked with Beard and Murphy after being notified by College security.

Student fellowships

Mellon and German govern-ment awards were among the graduate scholarships recently awarded to Williams students.

Edward Stein '87 is one of the 122 students in the nation to win the Mellon Fellowship in the Humanities. He plans to use the award to study analytic philo-sophy at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Stein, a founder of the Artificial Intelli-gence Study Group and the Idea Exchange Forum, is complet-ing a thesis on Evolutionary Epistemology.

Two recent Williams grads also won the fellowships, which include tuition, fees and a sti-pend. Edwin Weed '85 will be a Mellon fellow in English at Johns Hopkins, while Andrew Levin '83 will use his to study Indo-Tibetian Buddhism at Harvard or the Universities of Virginia, Michigan or Wis-consin.

Amy Jeffress '87 will spend next year studying in Germany, the recipient of a German Academy Exchange Student (DAAD) scholarship. The fel-lowship will cover a full year of study in a German University and travel expenses. Jeffress is a Class of 1960 scholar in her major, Political Science, and was College Council President for 1986-1987.

Several Williams College scholarships were also awarded. The Clark Fellow-ships, an award for one year of graduate study, were awarded to Stein and Charles Mahoney '87. Alternates for the award were seniors Laura Greene, Alak Chakravorty, and Edward Ewing.

The Charles B. Lansing Fel-lowships in Latin and Greek, awards for graduate or under-graduate study of those lan-guages, were awarded to Ann Bechan, Christine Jones and Michael Zebrák, all Class of 1987.

The Hubbard Hutchinson Memorial Fellowships, which are awarded for creative work in the arts and performance, went to three seniors. John Christakos, Lenore Doxsee, and Paul Rardin will hold the fel-lowships for two years.

Zoito prohibits tailgates

"There will be police officers — whether in uniforms or out — at football games next fall," Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito said last Thursday.

Zoito said that police officers will prohibit alcohol at tailgates because of the law prohibiting alcohol in open containers in public passed last fall and because people under 21 have been getting served freely at tailgates.

Zoito questioned how appropr-iate beer is at football games: "What's the purpose of giving someone a beer when they walk in, the weather? Cold beer on a snowy day — that doesn't click. What's the matter with soft drinks?"

Zoito's announcement fol-lowed the issuance of Williams' new party policy, which does allow tailgates.

"It's certainly the chief's right to interpret the open con-tainer law," Dean of the College Stephen Fix said.

Olmsted Prizes

The fourth annual winners of the Olmsted Prizes for out-standing secondary school teaching were announced this week.

Seniors nominate secondary school teachers whom they feel have played an important role in their intellectual and per-sonal development. The Olmsted Prize is a $1,000 award to each teacher and $500 to each of their schools.

This year's recipients are Judith Jordan, who taught Eng-lish at The Packer Collegiate Institute in Brooklyn, N.Y., nominated by Elizabeth Vig; John Matthias, an English and psychology teacher at Fortuna Union High School in Fortuna, Calif., nominated by Jay Alt-man; Terry Taylor, who teached instrumental music at Ellsworth High School in Spen-cerport, N.Y., nominated by Cristina Cervone; and Mercille Wisakowsky, a mathematics teacher at Alamo Heights High School in San Antonio, Texas, nominated by Susan Spoor.

The recipients have been invited to attend the College's 198th Commencement week-end, June 6-7, at which time their achievements will be for-mally recognized. The students who nominated them will be their primary hosts during the weekend's activities.

The fund for trhe Olmsted Prizes was established four years ago through the estate of Goerge Olmsted Jr., a 1924 Wil-liams graduate who died in 1976, as well as through gifts from his wife and children.

The Selection Committee was chaired this year by Russell H. Bostert, professor of history. The committee members were professors Steven J. Zottoli, biology, and Catherine B. Hill, economics, and Nancy J. McIn-tire, Assistant to the President fro Affirmative Action and Government Relations, and senior David C. Walters, and juniors Jenna K. Kakimoto and Erol Onel.

Flooding causes problems

Heavy rains last Saturday sent residents of the Spruces, the mobile home park on Main Street, fleeing the rising Hoosic River. North Adams and Che-shire were also affected by floods last week.

The weather caused some costly damage on campus. Water seeped into a basement room in Williams Hall last Sun-day and shorted out a trans-former, which will have to be replaced at a cost of about $30,000, Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar said.

The failure of the trans-former, at about 5:30 p.m., cut off electrical power from a number of campus buildings, including Sawyer Library, Bernhard Music Center, Wil-liams, Sage and Lehman halls and Dodd House. Power was restored after about three hours, Wassenar said.

Elsewhere, portions of Cole Field were underwater as late as Thursday. The water washed away much of the infield of the baseball diamond, where dirt had been placed only last fall, Wassenar said.

The baseball team will prac-tice at Mt. Greylock High School, and is scheduled to play at least some of its home games there, he said. The team may also use a field at Mount Anthony High School in Bennington.

Wassenar said that new top-soil and other materials needed to restore the infield could cost as much as $5,000. The work would probably take an eight-man crew two to three weeks to complete, he said.

The work cannot begin until the diamond is relatively dry, he added.

Other playing fields affected include those used by varsity and junior varsity men's lacrosse, varsity women's lacrosse, men's and women's rugby and women's softball. Some will require major clean-up efforts, Wassenar said.

Bernhard profs.

Three professors will join the faculty as Bernhard Visiting Professors during the academic year 1987-88, professor Law-rence Graver announced last week.

William Weaver, a renowned translator of Italian fiction, will be on campus for the fall term. Weaver has translated more than two dozen of the best-known works of Italian litera-ture, and has won many inter-national prizes for his work.

He will offer a Translation Workshop (Romance Lan-guages 201), the purpose of which is not to turn out profes-sional translators but rather to show language students, through practical example, some of the processes, prob-lems and satisfactions of transferring a text from one language to another.

Weaver will also teach a sur-vey course on Modern Italian Fiction (Italian 201) in which works by such prominent writ-ers as Italo Svevo, Alberto Moravia, Giorgiano Bassani, Primo Levi and Italo Calvino will be read.

In the spring, Linda Nochlin and William McNeill will be in residence as Bernhard Visiting Professors. Nochlin is Profes-sor of Art History at the Gradu-ate Center of the City University of New York, and a scholar of 19th and 20th century European art.

Nochlin will offer two courses. The first (Art History 352) will be on Courbet, Manet and Degas, and will explore the relation of these major French artists to the larger issues of aesthetic and social change in 19th century culture. Her second course, Feminism and 19th Century Art (Art History 552), will attempt to relate fem-inist theory to visual represen-tation in the past 200 years.

McNeill, formerly of the his-tory department of the Univer-sity of Chicago, is the author of many well-known books, includ-ing The Rise of the West, Plagues and People and The Human Condition: An Eco-logical View.

At Williams, McNeill will teach a seminar that will offer a retrospective view of his own influential The Rise of the West, to demonstrate how his views and the views of other people on the subject have changed since the book was pub-lished in 1963.

The seminar is designed to illustrate that history is a mov-ing art. McNeill will also teach a lecture-discussion course, History of the Moslem World, that will survey the rise and spread of Islam from the time of Mohammed to the 20th century.

Postmodernism exhibit opens at WCMA

by Michael Barsanti

Architecture usually means looking at buildings from the outside as opposed to inside them, but don't that to tell Hein-rich Klotz. Klotz is the organizer of the Williams College Museum of Art's new exhibit, Die Revi-sion Der Moderne: Postmodern Architecture from 1960 to 1985 that opened Saturday afternoon.

The exhibit takes up four gal-leries in the upstairs of the museum and consists of models, drawings, paintings and photo-graphs, all of varying degrees of reality. At a media preview on Friday, Klotz said that many of the works are "fictitious" in that they do not describe an actual building, but they are "new media for experimenting with thoughts before building." Because they are not burdened by cost or practicality, they give the truest sense of the archi-tect's original idea.

Heinrich Klotz, director of the Deutsches Architekturmuseum, is the organizer of "Die Revision Der Moderne: Postmodern Archi-tecture 1960—1985," which will be on display at the Williams Col-lege Museum of Art through July 19. (Albright)

Fanciful

Drawings and models give an architect artistic freedom, but can be dangerous when they lose sight of the goal of being a building. According to Klotz, the recent focus on architecture as a collectible art form has led some architects to build overly fanciful models that have no intention of ever being built for the sake of selling them.

Works like the ones in the exhibit have not been valuable for very long. One of the most striking models in the exhibit is of the famous "Piazza d'Italia" in New Orleans by Charles Moore. The Piazza is an enclosed square to be used for festivals, and has a fountain with an island in the middle in the shape of Italy, surrounded by colonnades.

Trash heap

It is one of the most interest-ing pieces in the exhibit, but Klotz found it several years ago on a trash heap. With the open-ing of his architecture museum in 1984, where this exhibit began, he has been responsible

Sports teams head south for spring training

by Alex Oh

During Spring Break, the hard-working and hard-playing athletes of Williams College prepared for their upcoming seasons by traveling to the southernmost parts of the coun-try for training. These trips are partially funded by the college but mostly by the athletic teams themselves.

Take the men's varsity lacrosse team, for example. The Ephmen's destination this year was Tampa, Florida, where they participated in the Sun Coast Lacrosse Tourna-ment. Although there were daily practices starting as early as 9:00 a.m., a great time was had by all, according to Mike O'Connell '87, one of the team's three co-captains.

In between visiting the area clubs and lounging around in the sun, the team managed to come away with two victories against Plymouth State and Air Force. Although the team suffered a defeat to arch-rival Amherst, O'Connell feels that th trip was important in pulling the team together socially as well as strategically.

The women's lacrosse team played in a similar tournament in Orlando, Florida. Although the weather proved disappoint-ing, the team came away with many interesting memories. Of those worth mentioning, according to Suzanne Falcone '88, are the pranks played on the freshmen teamates by the upperclassmen, such as putting vaseline on the shafts of the freshmen's sticks. Some members managed to visit Wet 'N Wild, a nearby amusement park; their only regret is that they didn't have time to visit Disney World.

The varsity track team, on the other hand, did find time for Mickey Mouse. The co-ed team spent the first week of vacation in Charleston, South Carolina, and then traveled to Jackson-ville, Florida, for the second week of their training trip. They trained hard for the prestigious Florida Relays by practicing for two hours each in the morn-ing and in the afternoon.

Practice payed off for Dawn MacCauley '89, who placed sixth in the 400 meter hurdles of the Florida Relays held at the University of Florida. The high school All-American broke her own record in this race, as reported by Becky Conklin '87, the women's team captain.

There were no such distinct accomlishments for the crew team members who visited Washington, D.C. over spring break; the team, being a club sport, was not funded at all by the college. The team financed their trip with money they earned through the infamous Erg-A-Thon, according to Olga Fryszman '88, a member of the women's team. She also said that with practices as early as 6:00 a.m., life in the capital seemed an endless cycle of "eat, sleep and row."

The men's varsity tennis team came away with a slightly more interesting trip from the sunny beaches of Coronado, California. The Ephmen stayed at the Naval Amphibious Base in San Diego with the generous support of Captain Clarey, and also benefited much from the

Bobby McFerrin

'Off to see the Wizard!'

by Thomas Cunningham and R. P. DeMott

The vocal antics of Bobby McFerrin left a packed Chapin Hall audience in awe Thursday night. McFerrin's solo performance had the crowd on its feet several times as he sang pieces ranging from the Beverly Hillbillies theme to a beautiful waltz composed for a member of the audience.

As he sang and mimed the nursery rhyme "Itsy Bitsy Spider," McFerrin admonished the crowd: "Don't be so hard core grown-up!" The joy of music seems to keep McFerrin young, and using only his voice and his body he entranced the audience for ninety minutes.

"The voice is the most intimate instrument. The audience has easy access," McFerrin said in an interview before the concert. "If you go to a piano recital at some level the crowd wants to participate, but everybody can't bring a piano or there'd be no room," he added.

Intimacy

McFerrin uses this intimacy to draw the audience into his show. He also said that he makes it a point to compose at least one new piece at every performance based on what he is experiencing.

On Thursday, he came down off stage, making songs from people's names and asking them to sing. One of the songs he created was a beautiful waltz written for a woman named Jolita. McFerrin sang to people and had others sing with him, using the audience to propel his music into new areas of exploration.

The variety of sounds that McFerrin produces is impressive. He can sound like a water harmonica, a keyboard synthesizer, a tape player on fast-forward, or a do-wop singer. His range stretches from a soul-like soprano to an electric bass. Listening to him it is understandable that he has received a grammy award for his voice.

Motown-ish

Perhaps the best example of his technical ability was in the Motown-ish "Down by the Riverside." McFerrin was able to create the impression that a continuous bass line went on as he sang the soprano part by singing bass notes in the gaps of the melody. His ability to change registers remarkably fast and the echoing of Chapin Hall, usually a problem for performers, made McFerrin's discrete bass notes ring long enough to blend together.

He claims that his style is not that unique once you get used to seeing a singer on stage without accompaniment. However, McFerrin creates not only lyrical music, but uses his voice to recreate sounds and effects that he hears and incorporate them into music. He made his own digital delay type echos in several pieces and his scat singing recreated the timbres of a water har-monica, a sitar, and a tape machine running.

McFerrin talked about the flexibility he felt the voice had as an instrument and about how he teaches his voice pupils. "I tell them there's an amazing amount of things they can do with it (the voice) if they simply have some imagination."

He developed his insightful style of singing ten years ago after being trained in piano and theory as a child. He said that in order not to end up with another's style, he became reclusive and brought his techniques from within. "I had enough musical expe-rience and information, I was concerned with technique, or how, as a singer, to present the music," he said.

Munchkins

Thursday, McFerrin showed the technique that he has deve-loped for an intimate presentation of the work incorporating his voice and body. His stage is presence is unrestrained. When he sings, his right hand beats a rhythm while his left hand follows the melody, drawing it in the air sometimes as if he were playing a bass or a trumpet.

He often enacts portions of his songs and dances to his own music. Thursday, he presented a one-man version of The Wizard of Oz. He sang and acted Dorothy, an entire munchkin village, witches and wizards. This piece earned a standing ovation.

Greylock Quad is first choice for freshmen

by Peter Balaban

Ninety percent of freshmen were granted either their first or second choice for upperclass housing in this year's inclusion process.

Greylock was the favorite pick among freshmen, with 250 applying there as a first choice. Berkshire Quad was the least popular choice, with 61 percent requesting it as their fifth choice.

Last year, 83 percent of freshmen received their first or second choices. This year, 72 percent got their first choice and 18 percent got second choice.

Freshmen were assigned to houses randomly by a computer program that is designed to maximize first choices. They submitted housing applications in early March and the process was completed during Spring Break.

The inclusion results, which are usually posted within a day of students' return from Spring Break, were delayed until last Wednesday by a malfunction in a new computer program.

Assistant Dean Mary Kenyatta said that the new program, designed to make the inclusion process compatible with the computerized student information system, was assigning students without regard to availablity of slots in each house.

Greylock Quad was once again the most popular housing category among freshmen, who recently received their housing assignments for next year. (Rifkin)

Forty-seven out of fifty-one freshmen who received their fourth or fifth choice were placed in Berkshire Quad, said Kenyatta, "which means that once again it will be an unhappy place."

"I think that Berkshire Quad is getting a bad rap. There are some lovely spaces over there, and a nice dining hall. The faculty associates with those houses have always worked really hard," she said.

The number of students who requested Mission Park as their first choice went down from 99 last year to 60 this year. "Part of me can really understand the objection to Mission Park because of the architecture," said Kenyatta.

She said that students who live in Mission as sophomores get involved in "the dominant ethos of party party beer and really don't try to do anything different."

For the past four years, affiliation transfer applications have been highest out of Mission Park and Berkshire Quad, Kenyatta said.

Cohen addresses issue of Jewish assimilation

by Nick King

What is the current state of American Jewry and in what direction is it heading? Are Jews assimilating into the American culture or has there been a Jewish cultural and religious revival? Professor Stephen Cohen of Queen's College adressed these issues in a lecture last Wednesday entitled "American Assimilation or Jewish Revival?".

Cohen said the debate about Jewish directions is dominated by the opposing views of the assimilationists and the revivalists.

The assimilationists argue that Jews are being assimilated into the American culture to such an extent that in the future there will no longer be a cultural group distinctively identifiable as Jewish.

Some symptoms of this trend, he said, are the disappearance of Jewish ethnic neighborhoods; increasing marriages with non-Jews; and dropping attendence rates among the young for Hebrew schools and Jewish organizaions.

The revivalists argue that there has been a tremendous revival of Jewish cultural identity. As evidence they cite the publication of significant numbers of books dealing with Jewish issues and increases in enrollments at day schools and Yeshivas.

Cohen said he takes a moderate position and views the trends in terms of "polarization". He said that Jewish society is becoming divided between a Jewish elite that "enjoys a richer more intense life than before" and a majority that is only nominally Jewish. "We are losing the middle." he said.

Responding to claims that intermarriage is threatening the integrity of the Jewish population, Cohen argued that "fertility rates and not intermarriage are the primary problem". He said that his surveys show that women in the age group of 35-44 "average enough children to keep the population stable".

Cohen said that Jews are far more politically active and powerful than in the past. He cited Washington's policies toward Soviet Jews and towards Israel as being attributable to sucessful lobbying by American Jews.

Cohen said that much of the concern over assimilation comes from people "involved in the Jewish identity industry". He said that it is "to their institutional interests to portray Jews as assimilating".

McFerrin

His actions are spontaneous and draw the audience into the fun. McFerrin is so obviously having fun that The Beverly Hillbillies theme doesn't seem out of place next to Thelonius Monk's Round Midnight (another grammy winner for him). For him they're equally part of the fun of music.

In the future, McFerrin said, he wants to produce a video and movie. He recognizes that his art is more than auditory and would be presented better in such media rather than just on records. He also wants to do a concert series next year where each night's performance is made up completely of sounds that he has heard that day.

Thursday's concert was sponsored by the Afro-American Studies Committee and was a part of the free concert series now in its seventh year.

neighboring San Diego Alumni Association. Although the team didn't fare too well in their matches — they lost to 8th ranked UCSD — they were blessed with beautiful weather throughout their stay, according to Kevin Callanan '87, the team's captain. A total of 10 varsity players went on the trip.

Finally, the varsity baseball team held their spring training session at various southern cities, including Savannah, Georgia, and Lakeland and Clearwater, Florida. Unfortunately, they weren't as lucky as the tennis team weather-wise, as it rained during most of their stay in Florida. The team participated in various games with other northern colleges down for training.

Black alumni discuss the job market

by Karen Costenbader

"People view you as a spokesperson for the entire black race, and that's a heavy burden to bear," said Terrence Henry '81 at the Black Alumni Panel Discussion held on Saturday. He said, "There's no room for mistakes," because "you are in a precarious position. You could be the first to go."

Henry, a student at Harvard Business school who will take a position at the Morgan Stanley next year, was one of the five alumni speakers on the panel. Ray Whiteman '81, Michele Rogers '79, Steve Rogers '79, and Donna Wharton '83 also spoke about their experiences after leaving Williams.

"As a black person going into the field I am, investment banking, I don't feel I have the right to make a mistake," continued Henry. "I must work two times as hard in order to become indespensible to my employer and keep up the expectations that I'm intelligent and trustworthy."

Steve Rogers, who also attended Harvard Business School and now works as a consultant at Bain and Company, quoted Reverend Jesse Jackson, saying, "Anything less than your best should be insulting to you." He emphasized that, "A Williams degree just doesn't do it all, you have to have a certain academic level."

Michele Rogers, his wife, is the Assistant Director of Admissions at the Harvard Business School. "Minorities, especially black people, don't have a lot of role models that are in business," she said, "and you know just from reading the newspapers that there's a lot of power in business today."

She said , from her point of view working in admissions, "Remember that one of the reasons you are there (any particular career) is because you checked that box saying black. That makes you as interesting as being from a farm in Iowa or from Sweden."

Whiteman, assistant vice president of Citicorp Industrial Credit in Chicago, reiterated that there are very few blacks in investment banking. He mentioned a survey of the Fortune 500 companies which indicated that affirmative action was number 23 in a list of 25 of company priorities.

ACSR advocates disinvestment in voting

by Paul Kwon

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities (ACSR) maintained its policy of disinvestment advocacy in their last two meetings. Its members approved proxies on eight companies that asked the companies to withdraw all operations from South Africa.

On Monday, March 16, they approved a proxy that would ask Abbot Labs, a pharmaceutical company, to withdraw from South Africa.

The company claimed that they were not in South Africa for business purposes, saying "There are unique considerations with respect to the health industry." Abbot Labs received a Sullivan rating of one, the highest possible. Forty percent of their employees are non-white.

ACSR chairman James Wood said, "I don't question what they are saying, but I assume almost all of what they sell goes to white-only hospitals."

Seven proxies approved

Similar proxies were levied on seven companies on April 6: Warner Lambert, Johnson and Johnson, Smithkline Beckman, DuPont, Mobil, Standard Oil, and R.J.R. Nabisco.

All seven proxies were approved as the committee decided that none of the companies' arguments were strong enough to warrant staying in South Africa.

Warner Lambert argued that the majority of their products were sold to non-whites, medicines which were essential to their health.

Johnson and Johnson was called by Wood "one of the most progressive companies in South Africa." Despite these arguments, the ACSR upheld its policy of disinvestment advocacy.

Another proxy on Mobil Oil was approved by the committee. This proxy would prohibit sales to police and military in South Africa. However, the current law in South Africa states that upon request, petroleum companies must sell petroleum to the government in secret.

McBride principles

Also on April 6, two proxies on the McBride principles were brought up. The McBride principles are principles which would insure fair employment to religious minorities in Northern Ireland.

According to Wood, American Home Products' program "is better than the McBride principles." The committee voted against the proxy on American Home Products. The ACSR also voted against a proxy on Boeing.

American Home Products received another proxy which would require uniform policies on their infant formula in all countries. According to the proxy, warnings about the formula were not issued as well in developed countries as in third world countries. The committee voted against this proxy.

A proxy levied against R.J.R. Nabisco would require that the company inform the third world of the dangers of smoking if the country's government does not. This proxy was approved.

Ramones to perform at SAC's spring concert

by Karen Costenbader

The Ramones will perform at the Lansing-Chapman hockey rink on the night of April 30th. The concert, sponsored by the Student Activities Committee (SAC), will cost approximately $8,000 to bring to the campus.

Matt Lapointe '88, SAC president, said the group is "a real good punk band out of New York City and probably the originators of American punk." He classified the band's music as "raw and raunchy rock-and-roll."

Last year, the SAC was unable to finance a spring concert. Lapointe said that this year, however, the SAC is not in debt. "We're looking pretty good. We're pretty solvent right now," he said.

The Ramones were chosen for the spring concert from the results of an all-campus survey made by the SAC. The Ramones received the most votes on the poll listing ten groups. An opening act for the group has not yet been decided upon, but Lapointe said that it will be either a local band or a band out of Boston.

Tickets for the concert will go on sale on or before April 15 and will cost six dollars with a student ID and ten dollars for non-students.

Attendance at the concert will be limited to 1,500. Lapointe said that the SAC is trying to attract local people other than Williams College students to attend.

The SAC is sponsoring two other events this spring. Johnny Copeland, a famous blues guitarist, will be performing in Chapin Hall on April 16. Musicfest, in which many campus musical groups perform in the Berkshire Quad, is tentatively scheduled for May 9.

Text of tutorial proposal

A Working Paper of the Committee on Educational Policy.

PREFACE

In the Fall of 1986, as part of its review of the College curriculum, the Committee on Educational Policy circulated a proposal to introduce tutorials as a regular part of the Williams education. Since that first draft proposal was offered for discussion, it has been debated extensively in the CEP, in a meeting of the faculty, in department meetings, in the College Council, in the Record, and informally among members of the community. These discussions have revealed a keen interest in the general idea of a tutorial program combined with some misgivings about aspects of the CEP's proposal. As a result, the Committee has reshaped that proposal to build on evident enthusiasm and to respond to shared reservations.

Among the various reservations expressed about the original proposal, several cropped up quite frequently. Some departments said that it would be difficult to offer required tutorials and still sustain other important aspects of a department's major and elective offerings. Other departments said that the nature of the material in their disciplines would make it difficult to adopt the tutorial format at the sophomore level. Others expressed the view that such a significant development in the College's curriculum and mode of teaching should come more gradually, and less ambitiously, than the proposal suggested. And many faculty members and students argued that if tutorials were to succeed, they must be voluntary.

On several major points, however, the CEP found a consensus, both within the Committee and in the College community generally. First, we agree that tutorials would present an enriching educational opportunity for our students: they would challenge students in ways that other modes of teaching do not. Second, we agree for various reasons that in most disciplines the advantages of tutorials are clearest if they are offered to students early in their careers at Williams. We agree that tutorials would add a distinctive dimension to education in the sophomore year, sharpening the intellectual skills of sophomores, and insuring the opportunity for students to form close intellectual relationships with faculty members early on in their time at Williams.

Having been informed by the objections and encouraged by the consensus, the CEP now unanimously recommends that the faculty adopt the following goal: To create the opportunity for students to take at least one tutorial course during their time at Williams.

I. INTRODUCTION: HOW TUTORIALS WORK

In a tutorial, a teacher and one or two students meet to discuss an assignment prepared by one of the students. The assignment consists of an essay, a problem set, or other appropriate exercise based on readings set by the tutor. The students come to the tutorial having read the materials and perhaps others they have chosen on their own. When the assignment is an essay, the tutor sets a broad topic for what is expected to be a narrowly focused paper, leaving it up to the student to choose the particular focus. In the case of a problem set, the student is assigned a number of problems and given some choice as to which ones to study.

The initial direction of the discussion is determined by the student: the tutorial begins with the presentation of the assignment. Some tutors will listen to the complete presentation before commenting or questioning the student; others will comment or question as the presentation unfolds. Since most of the tutorial is devoted to an intense critical discussion, the presentation itself last about twenty minutes. The focus may remain on the assignment throughout, or it may range widely over the week's material. The student not making the presentation will be expected to have done some stipulated portion of the set reading, to participate in the discussion, and perhaps to critique the presentation. In some cases, it may be desirable to have both students work together on the same assignment.

What actually goes on in any tutorial is likely to vary widely, depending on the subject area, on what the student has prepared, on the dynamics of the discussion , and on the tutor's perception of the strengths and weaknesses of individual students.

II. THE PROPOSED PROGRAM AT WILLIAMS

Definition of a tutorial course: A tutorial is a one semester course in which two students meet for sixty minutes ten times during the term with one faculty member. Each student presents an essay of 7-8 pages, or an equivalent assignment, in every other session. Thus, each student presents five essays or assignments during the term. The faculty member serves as tutor for a total of ten students, in five pairs in each tutorial course. Some tutors may wish to bring all tutees together at the start or end of the term for a group meeting. The tutor will arrange the schedule in the first session.

An optional program for students: Students will be encouraged, but not required, to take a tutorial course while at Williams.

Number of tutorials and staffing: In the first year of the tutorial program in 1988-89, the goal is to have 25-50 tutorial courses offered, with 250-500 registration slots. The subjects of many of these tutorials would be the same subjects currently offered in standard courses. All departments offering majors would be required to offer at least one tutorial course each year. Interdepartmental programs would not be required, but would be welcome to participate.

Level and registration priority: Most tutorials should be designed for sophomores. If staffing requirements, the needs of a major program, or the nature of the material make this too difficult, the departments could offer junior or senior tutorials, typically aimed at these majoring in the field. For most tutorials, registration priority would be given to students who had not yet taken a tutorial course. A roughly equal number of tutorials should be offered in the Fall and Spring terms.

Staffing help for departments offering tutorials: Those departments that choose to offer more than the one required tutorial may apply to the Director of the Tutorial Program and the Dean of the Faculty for partial replacement of the FTEs devoted to tutorial instruction. In responding to such requests, the Director and the Dean will take into account the difficulties created for the department by offering additional tutorials as well as the number of new FTEs (full-time faculty equivalents) available. Up to 3 new FTEs will be set aside to provide replacements during the first year of the program. In subsequent years the number may be increased depending on the success of the program.

Administration of the program: A faculty member, with a somewhat reduced teaching assignment, would direct the program. The Director would report to the Dean of the Faculty. As part of his or her overall responsibilities for administering the program, the Director would work with departments in developing tutorial courses, and would help educate the faculty about tutorial teaching.

Discussion with faculty about tutorial teaching: Beginning in 1987-88, teachers fromm other colleges and universities who are experienced tutors will be invited to Williams to discuss with the faculty the particular demands, methods, and pleasures of tutorial teaching. During this process, the faculty will also have the benefit of advice from colleagues at Williams who are experienced tutors.

Evaluation and review: The President will appoint a review committee to assess the program no later than its fifth year of operation. The (review) committee will recommend its continuation, extension, revision or discontinuation.

III. THE BENEFITS OF TUTORIALS

A tutorial is a peculiarly effective way to help students to grow intellectually in just those ways most valued at Williams. Many of the benefits of the tutorial system flow from two central and related features: the shift of intellectual initiative from teacher to student, and the creation of an atmosphere or intellectual intimacy.

In many disciplines rapid change in the quantity and kind of knowledge may be encouraging among students an attitude of passivity towards their education and an unwillingness to express and argue their ideas. With so much to learn (and so quickly) students may have understandably come to rely too much on their teachers. Tutorials strongly discourage this passive approach to education by giving the students the responsibility to set the terms of the discussion and the obligation to articulate and defend their views. A student's prepared assignment provides the focus of the tutorial. The precise approach to the assignment, the structure of argument, and the style of presentation are all up to the student and will determnine the course of the tutorial.

When a course of tutorials goes well, the student gains a greater appreciation of the pleasures and benefits of intellectual endeavor, and comes to understand that education is self-education. Tutorials would help deepen a student's commitment to sustained intellectual discussion, and would promote a desire for more of the same.

While the intimate intellectual atmosphere of a tutorial allows the student to take the initiative, it also allows the tutor to tailor the material and the discussion to the strengths and interests of the participants. The strongest student need not be bored, the weakest need not be lost. The setting of a tutorial encourages the student to explore issues in depth. An oral presentation followed by intense and focused argument and counter-argument is a particularly effective mechanism for clarifying the points at issue and helping the student to see more deeply into them.

This format is also a good way to help students hone their written and oral skills. There is nothing like the prospect of reading one's work aloud to a tutor to concentrate the mind on the literary task at hand, and hearing one's own writing, followed by the tutor's immediate response, shows what works and what does not. Tutorials also help students to speak more effectively and more cogently. The intimate setting breaks down verbal inhibitions and enables students to see that they can be both spontaneous and clear. Many students do not get enough practice at intellectual debate, some get none at all. Even at Williams there are students who manage to avoid discussing the central issues of their studies; in a tutorial there is simply no place to hide.

The introduction of tutorials in the College's curriculum would help counteract some of the loss of intimacy of educational scale that has taken place at Williams over the past two decades. The larger size of the student body and faculty and the growing diversity of their backgrounds and interests have many positive effects. They have also made the experience of a Williams education a more anonymous one. Many students pass through the College learning a great deal, but never forming the kind of relationship with a faculty member that permits a teacher to understand and criticize how a student thinks. Tutorials would make such an outcome less likely.

The College's touchstone image is that of Mark Hopkins at one end of the log, and a student at the other. The image represents the ideal at the heart of our traditional educational enterprise at Williams: a teacher and student engaged with each other in a common effort to learn. Introducing a tutorial component into the Williams curriculum would be a clear affirmation of that tradition.

IV. CONCERNS ABOUT WORKLOAD

In discussions of earlier versions of this proposal, students and faculty members have expressed worries that tutorials would impose difficult burdens on already busy people. But a closer look suggests that the demands on faculty and students would be similar to those of a regular course.

With five rather demanding papers or assignments, a tutorial course certainly would require considerable diligence and attention from students. However, students would be "in class" only 10 rather than the normal 36 hours in this course, and in most cases they would have no exams to prepare for.

For faculty members, too, teaching tutorials would be challenging, particularly the first time. But while faculty members would be "in class" for 50 rather than the normal 36 hours, the responsibility for presenting the material and organizing the discussion would be the student's; and since all five pairs of students would normally have the same assignment, faculty members would, in effect, have only 10 preparations during a term. Moreover, the total number of papers faculty members in a tutorial course would evaluate each term would be 50 — rather fewer papers than many faculty members now assign in regular courses. Finally, the teacher's response to such papers would normally be made in the tutorial hour itself. Individual papers and assignments would not be graded; the tutor would assign an overall grade at the end of the course.

It is worth adding that tutoring is a satisfying mode of teaching and occasional tutorials make a nice change from the steady diet of lectures and seminars. In contrast to lecturing and writing comments on student work, tutoring gives the instructor an immediate and accurate sense of impact he/she is having on his or her students. It is good to know when something works and to be able to try again when it does not. The flexibility of the tutorial system works to the teacher's advantage as well as to the student's. It tends to increase his or her effectiveness and offers greater scope for the explanation of individual intellectual interests.

CEP will hold forum on proposals Wed.

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) last week released two Working Papers which call for major curricular change.

One of the proposals would increase requirements from the current two courses in each of the three divisions to three per division, with at least two of those courses completed by the end of the sophomore year. If approved, the expanded requirement would be asked of incoming freshmen this fall.

The second proposal would create a program of optional tutorials. It would require every department which offers a major to conduct at least one course by tutorial. The program would begin in the academic year 1988-89 with 25 to 50 tutorials, according to the proposal.

The faculty has scheduled a vote on both proposals for its April 29 meeting, CEP chairman Thomas Jorling said.

The CEP will hold an open forum to allow students to discuss the proposals tomorrow at 8 p.m. in Chemistry 21.

The texts of both of the committee's Working Papers are reproduced here. Their publication was funded by the CEP.

Text of CEP's proposal on requirements

A working paper of the Committee on Educational Policy.

The Committee began its review of distribution with a look at the purposes and objectives of distribution requirements followed by a review of the current distribution requirements of the College. Having concluded that the current system is deficient in meeting the purposes and objectives, the Committee then reviewed a number of alternatives and prepared a working paper for discussion at the February faculty meeting. After further deliberation, the Committee has revised the proposal.

PURPOSES AND OBJECTIVES OF DISTRIBUTION

Distribution is the vehicle through which the College establishes the minimum standards for study in breadth in a liberal arts curriculum. Study in breadth accomplishes several, not mutually exclusive, educational objectives.

First, and at the greatest level of generality, it announces an educational policy and defines a liberal arts education as including at least a minimal encounter with all the main branches of human knowledge and with the modes of thinking and knowing characteristic of them.

Second, distribution serves as an advising mechanism, assisting students to experience the fullness of a liberal arts education. It signals broad areas of learning which we as a faculty determine are important for a citizen's full participation in society, and it helps overcome, by gentle insistence, psychological or emotional barriers to study of some disciplines.

Third, distribution can help students, especially those who have arrived at Williams without access to the full range of the liberal arts, to discover new disciplines which they may wish to study in depth.

Finally, viewed from a different perspective, distribution requirements have the added virtue of helping to ensure an adequate and equitable allocation of instructional resource. They help make it possible for interested students to find all branches of knowledge taught at the College in sufficient depth so as to maximize their choices, without the College being forced to sustain underelected areas by overstaffing them at the expense of understaffing more heavily populated areas — a state of affairs that clearly exacts an educational toll from students and faculty alike.

CURRENT DISTRIBUTION REQUIREMENTS

The current distribution requirement at Williams has two elements: first, a requirement that each student must take two courses in each of the three Divisions of the College, and second, a requirement that the courses satisfying distribution be completed by the end of junior year.

No further constraints or conditions accompany the distribution requirement. Students simply satisfy the requirement by assuring that at least 6 of their full load of 32 courses meet the distribution formula.

Our present distribution requirement does effect a rough distribution of students across the several branches of knowledge and funnels some enrollments to departments in the natural sciences which might otherwise be underenrolled.

EVALUATION

In examining the current distribution requirement against the objectives it is to serve, the Committee, while realizing that the requirement does effect a minimal and rough distribution of students across the several branches of knowledge, has judged it to be insufficient and in need of modest change.

The Committee has concluded that, because of the character of the clusters of Departments and Programs that make up Divisions I and II, Williams students generally satisfy the requirement in these two areas by selecting courses without much reference to the distribution requirement or the educational policy on which it is based. Moreover, within these Divisions, a student can satisfy the requirement by completing both courses in a single Department or program.

Divisions I and II are so inclusive that the two course requirement, without any further specification, fails to convey a clear educational message from the faculty regarding the purpose of the Division I and II requirement. Thus, in effect, the present distribution requirement can be appropriately characterized as a Division III or science requirement.

This science requirement does prod students into certain curricular choices, and does modestly increase enrollments in Division III. But at a time when, both nationally and at Williams, the sciences are experiencing a decline in enrollments, Liberal Arts Colleges in particular should regard themselves as under an obligation to help reverse that trend.

In a society under the increasing influence of science and technology, it is important to remove the "mystery" from both the process and substance of science, and to resist the widespread tendency to assume that only professional elites or experts can understand science. Increasingly, citizens will have to make choices, significant choices, about science and its products. An educated person needs more exposure to what science is and how it is conducted than is presently the case at Williams.

RECOMMENDATION

In order to construct de novo a distribution requirement designed to ensure that each of our students has at least a minimal encounter with the main branches of human knowledge and with the modes of knowing and thinking characteristic of them, we would have to (i) come to an agreement about the lines dividing the principal branches of knowledge and modes of knowing, (ii) categorize accordingly every individual course we offer, and (iii) mandate for all our students some minimal exposure to each of the collections of courses grouped under those categories. Unfortunately, departments as we know them being a deliverance of history, they no longer correspond very precisely with the lines which divide one branch of knowledge or mode of knowing from another. Nor, indeed, is there anything approaching universal agreement about where, exactly, those lines should be drawn.

The Committee deliberated extensively on the question whether, in addition to the objective of spreading students across the curriculum, a formula could be devised to direct students into substantive areas of study. The Committee has been especially concerned about three areas where, on educational policy grounds, it could be argued that more emphasis should be placed: foreign language and literature, non-western cultures, and laboratory science. The Committee tried a number of formulas to graft these educational policy objectives into the distribution requirements, but we found none that was satisfactory.

This being so, we are not recommending any fundamental change in the framework of the distribution requirement. What we propose, instead, is a modification of much more modest dimensions. We take as our point of departure, that is, not some new theoretical scheme but our present divisional categories, which, having survived over a quarter century of curricular debate, clearly enjoy some measure of robust support from the faculty. We propose to amend the distribution requirement not in such a way as to correspond to all its putative deficiencies, but only to that deficiency which, under present conditions, stands out as the most glaring: namely, its excessive modesty.

Specifically, we propose to retain the current three Divisions of the College but to increase the number of courses required in each division to completed by the end of sophomore year. In addition, we propose that no more than two of the courses used to satisfy the requirement in a given Division can have the same course prefix. By combining the above shift in timing with the stipulation that students take courses in at least two departments in each division, we hope to encourage not only a better (and earlier) sampling of the breadth of the College's curricular offerings but also (and therefore) better informed choices of major.

POLICY ON AREAS OF STUDY

While the Committee concluded the vehicle of distribution was not appropriate for establishing minimum requirements on the study of foreign languages and literatures, non-western cultures and laboratory sciences, we did conclude that the College should announce a policy on the importance of these areas of study.

It is becoming increasingly clear that Americans need to understand better the global context in which we live. The study of foreign languages, literatures, and cultures is an indispensable aid in this process of understanding, and has the significant benefit of also leading to better insight into our own culture. Virtually every student who has encountered non-American cultures remarks on the "Aha-experience" of realizing both how unique certain American traditions are, and how indebted the total American experience is to the various other cultures it draws on.

Along with foreign languages and literatures, the Committee has discussed the possibility of including a requirement that all students take at least one course which studies a non-western culture. Most of us believe that the educational objective of such a requirement is laudable, but we doubt that imposing it would have the desired effect. Nonetheless, we believe we should adopt and emphasize a policy to urge students to take such courses. Indeed, we question whether a liberal arts education can be considered adequate if it does not acquaint students with non-western cultures. As we can already discern from contemporary events, a Eurocentric world view will be inadequate to the new realities of international relations in the 21st century. Since Williams is an institution which trains future leaders, we have a particular responsibility to provide the kind of education that will prepare Williams graduates to respond sensitively and effectively to non-western people and cultures.

The role of science and technology in shaping conditions of life in the modern world is now dominant. Yet, students can pass through a liberal arts education without exposure to science suffucient to allow effective participation as citizens in decisions which will shape their lives. Moreover, many students can complete a liberal arts education without overcoming the fear and mystery they so often associate with science. In addition to the expanded distribution requirements, the CEP recommends the College adopt a clear policy encouraging the study, not just about science, but of science. In furtherance of this policy, the Science Departments should be encouraged to develop courses having laboratory or field components which permit actual experience with the scientific method.

Therefore, the Committee recommends that every possible means be used to urge strongly the study of laboratory sciences, foreign languages, literatures, and especially non-western cultures. These means should include statements of encouragement by departments, descriptions of educational policy in admissions and other College catalogue and registration materials, and encouragement and emphasis of these policies by advisers at all levels.

SUMMARY

Our proposal on distribution builds upon the current stucture and reflects the discussions at the faculty meeting in February. We think it represents, on balance, an improvement in our distribution requirement. It provides a mechanism for more effectively distributing students across the curriculum, while at the same time affording a framework, which coupled with advising and guidance mechanisms, can implement the educational policies we have enunciated.

MOTION

1. That the sentence on page 10 of the Catalogue which now reads:

"Each student must complete at least two graded semester courses in each division by the end of the junior year"

be replaced by the following:

"Each student must complete at least three graded semester courses in each division. Two such courses in each division must be completed by the end of the sophomore year. No more than two of the courses used to satisfy the requirement may have the same course prefix."

2. That the new requirement be in effect for the Class of 1991.

3. That the College adopt and emphasize an educational policy encouraging the study of foreign languages and literatures, non-western cultures, and laboratory and field sciences.

for much of the re-evaluation of architecture as art.

As far as postmodernism is concerned, while it may sound like an imposing cocktail-party stopper, if you have ever been inside the new museum, you'll get the idea. Charles Moore, who designed the Williams College Museum of Art, is a leader of this movement, and is featured prominently.

Inside the museum, one sees a lot of simple geometric shapes in the building that show a modernist influence, but it is punctuated and softened with arches, pillars, and other classical forms that show deference to older architecture. In this way, postmodernism is a revision of modernism in that it wants "to keep the tradition as much as possible, but change it as much as necessary," according to Klotz.

Geometry

Klotz said he believes that after World War II, architecture became "more and more boring." The concentration on abstract geometry led to the development of buildings as box-like "containers" that maximized function and cost-effectiveness, but were artistically sterile, he said. Postmodernism tries, in Klotz's words, "to put fiction back into function."

The best example of this would be the different showrooms designed for Best stores by the SITE group. The showrooms are basically boxes, but it was up to the SITE group of artists and architects to do something creative with each one of twenty. As a result, there is one store on display that seems to have a corner broken off it, another where the face of the building has been lifted off, and is precariously tilted at the top of the store, opening it up, though seeming like it is going to fall at any moment.

Installation

The installation of the exhibit is a postmodernist achievement itself. In the main gallery, there are three 22-foot towers, each topped with a roof almost half its size, each a different geometric shape.

Building each tower "was like building a house," according to WCMA Director Thomas Krens, because of the weight each needs to hold, and the electric wiring inside. Each of the towers cost about $50,000. Funding from IBM helped to defray the cost of the installation, which will be used again when an exhibition of Japanese folk art opens in August.

The exhibit originated in Frankfurt and traveled to the Center George Pompidou in Paris where, according to Klotz, over 450,000 people came to see it. Almost as many visited the exhibit in the National Museum of Modern Art in Tokyo, and from Williams it will go to the IBM gallery of science and art in New York.

Swap

This exhibit came to the WCMA as a swap; the Charles Moore exhibit that opened the museum in October was sent to Frankfurt in exchange for this one. There are also a series of films on modern archtects to accompany the exhibit, the next one being on Arata Isozakl on Wednesday in Lawrence Hall at 8:00 p.m.

Kreugler speaks on nonviolent struggle

by Peter Balaban

Nonviolent struggle (NVS) is a range of behavior in conflicts that have the effect of imposing costs on opponents without imposing danger to life, said Chris Kreugler last week in his lecture "Toward a Comprehensive Strategic Approach to Nonviolent Struggle."

Kreugler, a member at the Harvard Program on Nonviolent Sanctions, said that nonviolent struggle has almost always been improvised and is a technique frequently chosen by default after other alternatives have failed.

There is always a latent threat that violence might come into any nonviolent conflict, said Kreugler. Even Gandhi and Martin Luther King would say 'deal with us or them', (them being other opponents advocating violent struggle).

Kreugler cited the fact that the alternative to King was the the black power movement. "In practice, nonviolence is almost always mixed with violent examples."

Kreugler stressed the fact that NVS clearly differs than a philosophy of principled nonviolence. Whereas the former is a behavioral phenomenon, the latter is a set of values.

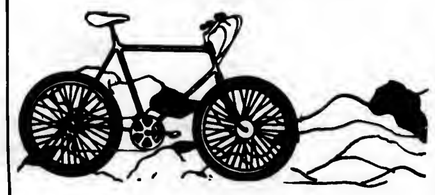
He cited one study that concluded that in as much as 85 percent of the instances of NVS, there was no evidence that any of the leaders knew anything about the value system of principled nonviolence.

Citing the cases of the Polish labor union Solidarity and the Indian independence movement, Kreugler insisted that the "degree of success with this technique varies widely," and that strategic blunders have consistently plagued attempts at nonviolent struggle.

A key split in the leadership of the Solidarity led to a serles of "crummy choices", most significantly a premature escalation of the conflict with the Polish government, according to Kreugler. As a result of the split, he said, it took Solidarity six years to regain its original standing. Kreugler called Gandhi a "brilliant tactician, a profound social philosopher and a really crummy strategist," asserting that Gandhi's premature accomodation of the British by agreeing to a roundtable discussion with them in 1931 delayed the granting of independence by several years.

Other cases of NVS Kreugler discussed included the Russian Revolution (1904-1906), the Danish Resistance to German Occupation (1940-1945), and the 1944 Civic Strike in El Salvador.

Kreugler listed ten principles for conflict with nonviolent sanctions: continuity, legitimacy, consistency, cohesion, endurance, dispersion, concentration, initiative, flexibility, and consolidation.



He called the American Civil Rights Movement a prototypical struggle and predicted a major social movement in America before the 1990's based on economic issues.

Identifying the Fundamentalist Christian Movement as a Nonviolent Movement, he said that the leaders could achieve a great deal more if they understood the strategies of NVS. Fortunately, he said, they do not. He added that the recent PTL scandal is a severe setback because it delegitimizes the leadership of the movement.

The lecture was the third in a series given in conjunction with Sociology 450: Nonviolence and Social Change.

dential Seminar (FRS), distribution requirements and social life.

The Trustees were interested in whether or not the FRS is fulfilling its objectives. Said Michelle Whelpton '90, participant in FRS, "We felt that it had achieved its goal — a lot of discussion is going on outside of the classroom, especially this semester since the topic of ethics has provoked personal feelings and emotions."

In response the the Trustees queries as to whether this was feasible in other entries, the group had no objections. "Those of us living outside of the FRS noted that in other entries students quite spontaneously participated in academic discussions," said Chris Strawbidge '90.

In discussing distribution requirements, Strawbridge said, "A lot of people are Division 3-shy. A lot of intro courses are designed for pre-meds, and used to weed out people. So when they take a course, they take a gut. A lot of the time they've already gone over the material, or they are bored and it is a waste of time."

In response to this, the Trustees proposed that students be able to take such courses Pass/Fail. The group supported this, stating that it would allow students to be concerned not with the grade, but with the substance of the course.

"They were able to relate to us on our wavelength," Whelpton said of the Trustees. "They were on top of things, constantly trying to make improvements. They are excited about Williams and what is going on."

runners on his heels. Coming into the final stretch, the race was even, but Fisher pulled out a strong drive to the finish and won in 1:58.9, the best time of his career for the event.

Also impressive in victory was Andre Lopez '87, running in fine form to win the 400 meters in 49.5 seconds. Lopez had travelled to California during spring break to compete in the 800 meters at the Fresno Relays. He ran 1:52.40 to qualify for Division III Nationals. "I have never run this fast so early in the season," he said. "I'm looking to do some good speed work in the next few weeks before nationals, and I hope run 1:48 in post-season competition."

Also qualifying for nationals during spring break was Dawn Macauley '89. She posted a time of 63.08 seconds in the 400 meter hurdles to take fifth at the Florida Relays. Macauley was in fine form at Saturday's meet, winning both hurdle events, taking third in the high jump and anchoring the victorious 4x400 meter relay team which set a new school record. The team, consisting of Susan Gray '90, Jen Morris '89, Ann Danhauer '90, and Macauley, ran a time of 4:11.

The other standouts for the women's team were freshmen Karlyn McNall and Shelley Whelpton. McNall captured both the long jump and triple jump, while Whelpton won the javelin throw and took second in the discus and shot put.

The team will compete in the NESCAC championships next weekend at Bowdoin.

"In reality, the golden spoon does not apply to us," he said. "Williams does not give you a carte blanche to the world."

Wharton said she had come to the panel to represent the public sector and spoke of her work as an urban planner with the Boston Housing Authority. She advised black students that, "it's critical to think very hard about what you really want and what your personal interests are," in deciding upon a career.

She related how she had entered a training program in investment banking upon graduating from Williams and soon realized that her real interests were in working in the public sector.

She encouraged others, saying "Be committed to yourself and know that you can do whatever you choose to. Just go at your own pace and separate yourself out of all the commotion that can go on here (OCC) in the spring when everyone's looking for jobs."

icy, according to Dean of the College Stephen Fix. CUL devised a new plan which helped form the new policy.

Liability problems

To resolve problems raised by the new laws on liability, the deans consulted with attorneys from the Boston law firm Palmer & Dodge. The question of the college's liability for students' actions remains unresolved, due to a lack of case history on this subject.

"It is not clear that you can adopt any policy on this question that would completely protect the college from liability," Fix said.

Even a stricter policy would not reduce the college's chance of being held liable for a student's actions, Fix and Kenyatta said.

"The college plays a role in promulgating the law and informing students of what it is, and adherence to the law is the individual's responsibility," Fix said.

"We're concerned about preserving a social life," Kenyatta said. "We realize where we are. We also realize that to make sure that noone underage obtains alcohol would require us to be policemen, and we do not want to be policemen."

Changes from old policy

The new party policy differs from the old one in the means financing, the number of people allowed at different types of parties and the amount of alcohol allowed at parties.

Admission to parties cannot be charged, a change made earlier in the year, because charging admission to a party with alcohol is considered selling alcohol.

The deans established a House Entertainment Fund for each residential house to pay for party expenses other than alcohol and fines. Alcohol cannot be purchased with money from this fund, Kenyatta said, because of liability problems.

Kegs of any kind are banned from suite parties, self-contained parties of 20 or less people. "There are some people saying that for a party of under 20 people it is okay to have a quarter-keg or a beer ball," Kenyatta said. "It is not."

The maximum number of half-kegs allowed at a party is eight. "There's no magic formula by which we got eight," Fix said.

CUL members objected to the limit on the number of kegs and the prohibition on kegs at suite parties at the CUL meeting last Wednesday.

"Financially unfeasible"

CUL member Mary Petersen '87 said that having to buy cases of beer instead of a quarter-keg places an unreasonable financial burden on a student. "You're not only becoming socially responsible," she said, "You're becoming financially unfeasible. Do you buy social responsibility in that way?"

"Security is not going to be out looking for these things. If there's no problem, there's no problem," Fix said in response to complaints by CUL members about not having kegs at suite parties. "There are a lot of parties the dean's office doesn't hear about," he said. "Draw your own conclusions."

Kenyatta said that the deans had been requested by Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zoito to forbid kegs at all parties.

"It's too much beer in one place," Zoito said in reference to kegs. "How does anybody down there control a keg? How many drinks does somebody have to have before you say to someone you've had too much?" he asked.

Zoito said he approves of the ban on charging admission at the door. He echoed Fix's comments that neither security nor the police bothers investigating quiet parties. "Small amounts, small parties, we never know about it," he said.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix defended the new party policy, saying, "Don't forget that there are many colleges where there is no alcohol allowed in student residences at all." (Ward) plate. The junior unloaded a monsterous drive to left field which cleared a tree beyond the outfield to put the Ephs up 5-4.

In the top of the sixth with lefty closer Scott Kennedy '89 on the hill, Pachus made a Brooks Robinson-like dive to spear a shot in the hole to deny Tufts a tying baserunner. Two plays in the seventh exemplified the Ephs' effort for the day. In the top of the inning, Jim Duquette '88 was stranded in a rundown after a botched suicide-squeeze but managed to score after a throw hit his helmet. Then the game ended with another Beisito-led double play as the smooth senior backhanded a ball up the middle and flipped it with his glove to shortstop Collins whose relay to Hedeman closed the game.

Williamson heroics

On Friday, the Ephs traveled to Trinity, falling by a 9-8 count. Bantam catcher Jason Williamson had quite a day, hitting two homers and the game-winning three-run double in the ninth to total seven RBI's. Duquette had a three-run blast to highlight a six-run fourth inning as Williams carried a 8-3 lead into the seventh behind a solid performance from starter Chris Conway '89.

However, Williamson's second dinger forced Conway out, and the Bantams forged a comeback against Eph relievers. One out from defeat, Trinity loaded the bases and Williamson's drive to deep center bounced off a diving Duquette's glove as the winning run scored.

Southern trip

On the southern trip, Williams was overmatched against a very difficult schedule of Division I and II squads. Conway picked a win versus Hillsdale but Florida Southern, Illinois-Chicago and St. Leo's all were victorious against the Ephs in the 1-7 trip.

Water Polo stuns Div. I field at UNC

by Jim Jordan

Over spring break the water polo team ventured south to clash with some of the biggest names in the National Collegiate Athletic Association during the 1987 Tarheel Invitational Water Polo Tournament at the University of North Carolina.

The event was the first contest held in the new Koury Natatorium, adajacent to the Dean Smith Dome. Williams, however, was not at all intimidated by the Division I opposition as they fought to an overall second-place finish.

On the first day of competition, the Ephs were slated to square off against Virginia, but the Cavaliers were obviously in no mood to be humiliated by a bunch of pale northerners, the Ephmen winning by default. Later in the day, Williams started off the tourney with a victory over the host Tarheels, 7-5. The Purple attack featured balanced scoring, with Will Andrew '86, Dave Cantor '89 and Chris Kirwan '87 each contributing two goals.

The next morning, the Ephmen returned to the pool to face North Carolina State. Against the Wolfpack, the Ephs jumped out to an early 3-0 lead, paced by the strong play off hole-setter Adam Ifshin '87. However, State refused to die, and with only three minutes remaining, they tied the score at 7-7. With only 39 seconds left on the clock, Kirwan fired a skip shot past the State goalie, and the Ephs went on to win 9-7.

Freshman Andy Kaplinsky was the star for the Ephmen as he threw in a tournament-high five goals in the contest and had three saves at goalie in the final period. The win set up a showdown against the Duke Blue Devils in the tournament championship.

The game against Duke was clearly the best game of the tourney for both squads. After one quarter of stellar defense in front of goalie Mike DeSenne '89, the Ephs led 1-0 and were threatening to upset the favored Devils. But Williams began to falter in the second and third periods as Duke battled to a 3-2 lead. Going into the final stanza, the Ephs were optimistic about their chances to win the event, but fatigue became a factor as the Blue Devils pulled away to a 6-3 win.

For the tourney, Kaplinsky led the Ephs with seven goals, with Ifshin tallying four and Cantor and Kirwan three. Also instrumental in the Ephs' good showing was the excellent play of goalie DeSenne. Starting his first-ever tournament as an Eph, the soph averaged over ten saves a game, yielding less than five goals a contest.

This spring the Ephs plan a brief schedule which will likely include a final match in Muir Pool with archrival Amherst.

Mazzaro '87 and Jeff Heilman '87 took turns failing on the ball to make the score 16-6 with Merriam's conversion.

The final try of the match came as Newcomber once again took it upon himself to rise above mediocrity and embarked on an incredible 40-yard sprint into the try zone. With Merriam's conversion, the game ended at 22-6.

After successful B and C-side matches, the Ephs took part in yet another chapter of Harvard's shady social etiquette in the post-game festivities. Later, the maroon and gold dispersed, soon to regroup in the Purple Valley for the P.V. Classic against Siena, Norwich and Vermont.

third before Hunt's motivating tactics swayed the match back in the Ephs' favor. Friend's excellent return of serve and Hunt's put-away volleys decided the match as the two raised their level of play to take the "W."

Sloane remarked on the "good depth" of the team which is demonstrated by freshmen Caltibiano and Hunt playing numbers five and six, respectively. Although both freshmen fell to Tufts in singles, Sloane and Callanan are confident about the new additions to the team. "Both freshmen are solid players who should contribute a lot this season," said Callanan.

In the two upcoming matches against Colgate on Wednesday at home and Amherst away on Saturday, the Ephs will face the two toughest teams they have left to play. Coming off a 3-0 week and a good performance in San Diego on the spring trip, these two matches will be excellent indicators of the team's chances in the NESCAC tourney later in the month.

Our Constitution was born out of a cacophony of competing voices.

But today the freedom of speech that remains the hallmark of our Constitution may be threatened.

The NAAAF Essay Contest is designed to emphasize the importance of free speech and open debate in a vital area.

In his best-selling book, They Dare to Speak Out: People and Institutions Confront Israel's Lobby, former Congressman Paul Findley sounds an alarm: "It is clear that many Americans do not feel they can speak freely on one of the most complicated and challenging current issues: The Arab-Israeli dispute."

Is he right? What do you think?

Full time college and university students are invited to submit a critical essay of 2,500 words or less on the subject "The Development of American Middle East Policy: Is Free Speech Threatened?"

There will be 200 regional winners of $1,000 each and 10 national winners of an additional $4,000 each.

The contest is sponsored by the NAAA Foundation, a charitable organization which carries out educational programs on Middle East subjects.

Television commentator Tom Braden serves as Honorary Chairman of the Selection Committee. Distinguished columnist Carl Rowan is Awards Chairman.

Now there's more than one way to get through college.

To get ahead in college, it helps if you choose a brilliant roommate. Like a Macintosh™ personal computer. And now there are two models to choose from.

The Macintosh Plus, which comes with one 800K disk drive and a full megabyte of memory (expandable to four).

And the new Macintosh SE. Which comes with either two built-in 800K drives, or one drive and an internal 20-megabyte hard disk. As well as a choice of two new keyboards.

Inside, the SE also has an expansion slot, so you can add a card that lets you share information over a campus-wide network. Or another card that lets you run MS-DOS programs.

Whichever Macintosh you choose, you can use the latest, most advanced software. And that means you'll be able to work faster, better and smarter.

No two ways about it.

Hedeman beats Jeffs in shutout

by Chris Adams

As with any other game this weekend the weatherman and the groundskeepers were the big stories in getting the fields in shape for the women's softball team to be able to play Amherst Saturday in its first game.

The team looked sharp after a shaky first inning featuring errors by Emily Donovan '90. After that it was "a boring game" according to pitcher Nancy Hedeman '89, who pitched a complete game shutout. Hedeman made the game easy for her infield mates of Wendy Roy '88, Lori Schean '89, Kathy Oehling '87 and Tery Ballard '87.

Oehling was the batting star with a triple and a single and two runs scored while Hedeman's pinpoint pitching baffled the Lady Jeffs, allowing the team to overcome the poor field and epidemic of stomach virus which afflicted the battery of Hedeman and Donovan. The 3-0 win gave the squad a record of 1-0 as it heads into today's matchup with the Dutchwomen of Union.

In her first year of play, Missy Crouchley takes a mighty cut at an Amherst pitch in her squad's 3-0 whitewashing of the Lord Jeffs on Saturday at Cole Field. (LeBauer)

Track captures 1st at Trinity tri-meet

by Steve Brody

The track team travelled to Hartford on Saturday to run against Trinity and Connecticut College. Not surprisingly, the powerful Eph squad was victorious. The men's team scored 95 points to Trinity's 87 and Connecticut College's 9, while the women scored 74, ahead of the 59½ and 47½ scored by the Bantams and the Camels.

The men were led by the high scoring performances of Henry Jones '88 and Scott Purdy '88. In his first competition this season, Jones captured three events to post 15 points for the Ephmen. He started the day with a victory in the long jump at 21'1½", and followed that by winning the triple jump with a leap of 42'8". Jones then finished the meet with a victory in the high jump. Coach Richard Farley said of Jones, "He'll jump farther than that later in the season, but it was still an excellent early season performance."

Purdy showed his diversity by taking first in the 400 meter intermediate hurdles and second in the 100 highs, his two best events. He then came back to help Williams in the field events, taking second in the triple jump and fourth in the high jump.

Perhaps the most exciting race of the day was the men's 800 meters. The first lap of the race was slow, allowing the entire field a shot at the victory as the race moved into the second lap. Jon Fisher '87 shot to the front, sprinting down the back stretch with two Trinity

by Al Mottur and Stewart Verdery

Over the past year, the world of sports has been rocked by a series of shocking events surrounding the use of drugs. The eerily-close cocaine deaths of Len Bias and Don Rogers; the revelation of former Villanova basketball player Gary McClain that he was "wired on coke in the Rose Garden;" and the news that Dwight Gooden would enter a rehab center for a coke addiction. These circumstances have stunned fans everywhere who now have to question the integrity and responsibility displayed by some of this nation's finest athletes.

Professional and college standout athletes are role models to our country's children and whether they like it or not, they have a certain duty to live up to that role. However, the question that remains to be answered is: Should the athletic institutions impose regulatory measures, such as drug testing, on its athletes in the order to preserve that role?

Many experts argue that drug testing is necessary to 'clean up' college sports. On the other side of the coin, there are those who say that drug testing is a direct infringement of one's constitutional rights. Both sides have a case. Widespread drug testing would likely have a cleansing effect while violating every athlete's — those on drugs and those not — right to privacy.

Last months' NCAA hoop tourney, in which the seven leading players of all of the participating schools sumbited urine samples after playing, showed that testing can be an effective deterrent to drug use. We, for one, find it hard to believe that, assuming the negative tests were correct, hundreds of players had been clean throughout the season. Thus, if for only a small part of the season, for a small number of players, testing stopped drug use.

Testing would likely be effective in this vein when applied on a widespread basis in college athletics. However, the impetus should be placed on the schools to implement testing, not on the NCAA, usually incompetent in important matters. Universities and colleges, if they choose, should be able to make testing a prerequisite for playing. Then schools wanting to have clean programs could do so, and those who object to testing or do not care would not be forced to.

The NCAA would be provided with the task of investigating drug testing programs. They would be responsible for publishing the status of any testing at member schools as to educate prospective student-athletes. Colleges with no or weak testing would soon be labeled as such, weakening the attraction for television etc. to cover them, attributes which make schools look good to recruits.

As far as pro sports, owners should feel free to include drug clauses in players' contracts. They are paying millions for top athletic performance and should get it. Owners, league officials and players' associations have a huge stake in presenting the best possible product and testing would enhance the field play of all athletes.

Crew warms up for Little Three with win

by Seth Burns and Tim Bock

The heavyweight varsity men's crew boat, stroked by senior captain David Esseks, outrowed Worcester Polytechnical Institute and Connecticut College last weekend. Locked in a tight battle for the first 500 meters, the Ephmen pulled out to a comfortable lead by the halfway point in the 2000 meters race and held on to win by five seconds, 6:30.7 to WPI's 6:35.4. The win follows a victory over Conn. Coll., Drexel and Villanova, giving them good momentum going into Little Three competition this weekend.

One other race of interest was the freshman eight boat. Their vessel was hit by a motorboat just prior to racetime, sheering off part of the boat, causing it to fill with water, and chewing up an oar. Despite this, the men went on to take first behind new stroker David Sette-Ducati '89.

The Little Three meet will see the awarding of the first Charlie Cost '87 trophy to the winner of the freshman race.

The varsity heavyweight women's boat, stroked by Lisa Marrack '89, also turned in a very impressive performance, defeating Conn. Coll. by seven seconds and finishing well ahead of WPI and the Coast Guard. Coach Chris Cruz commented that the varsity women are "rowing exceptionally well for this time of the season." The women are looking forward to meeting Wesleyan and Amherst this weekend, hoping to regain the Little Three title, which they had held for 15 years. The women's varsity four lost by four seconds to Conn. Coll. and the Coast Guard, but outpaced WPI by eight seconds.

Baseball sweeps Tufts behind Pachus

by Stewart Verdery

Putting together solid performances in all areas of the game, the baseball squad earned two needed wins at Mt. Greylock Saturday with a doubleheader sweep over Tufts 10-4 and 6-4. Clutch hitting, perfect fielding and good starting pitching from Mike Barbera '89 and Scott Garfield '88 doomed the Jumbos, as Williams raised its northern record to 2-1.

In the opener of the double dip, Barbera shut down Tufts in the opening frame with the help of the first of three Steve Belsito '87 to Lew Collins '88 to Rick Hedeman '87 double plays. Chris Pachus '88 then doubled in two runs as the Ephs took a 3-0 first inning lead. Collins' two-run double in the second pushed the margin to 5-0 before the Jumbos were able to rough up Barbera for two runs in the third, an inning which saw the ejection of the Tufts manager.

The Eph sophomore then settled down, retiring eight straight batters before tiring in the seventh. Reliever Bill Ryan '88 used a 4-6-3 double play to end the contest with a final score of 10-4. A key in the victory was the Ephs' ability to avoid leaving runners on base, a large factor in the previous day's loss to Trinity, as only three Eph baerunners failed to cross the plate.

Rick Hedeman displays the form that has placed him atop the Eph batting leaders with an awesome .516 batting average. Against Tufts, 'Heders' sprayed three hits in four at bats. (LeBauer)

In the nightcap of the twinbill, the Ephs took advantage of two infield hits to scratch out two first inning runs to take a 2-1 lead. After captain John Shaw '87 doubled in Pachus in the third, Tufts bounced back for two runs in the fifth to take a 4-3 lead. However, with the chance to give Garfield a win, Collins singled to bring Pachus to the Hunt-Friend doubles pair propels tennis by Jumbos

by Julie Jacobson and Mary Kipp

On Saturday the men's tennis team claimed its third victory in a hard fought match against Tufts, last year's New England Division III Champion. The 5-4 win over the Jumbos indicates a promising season since, according to coach Sean Sloane and senior captain Kevin Callanan, Tufts was one of Williams' most formidable competitors. Earlier in the week, the Ephmen opened their season by beating Middlebury 5-4 and downing Clark 6-3.

Number one player Callanan easily routed Tufts' Gary Frank in straight sets 6-1, 6-2. Number two Drew Sawyer '89 split sets with Steve Marsella but pulled through in the third to gain a 7-5, 2-6, 6-3 win for the Ephs. Sawyer's win was the first of two inspiring three set matches that pushed the team to victory. The other singles win was raked in by Chris Myers '87 to knot the score at 3-3.

True to Sloane's prediction, the doubles matches were the deciding factor. Going into the matches he was "confident about the pairings." He saw the match against Tufts as a "test" for the doubles teams which they passed by taking two out three from the Jumbos to earn the victory.

The number one team of Callanan and Sawyer fell in a close match after having three match points on Callanan's serve in the second set. The final score was 4-6, 7-5, 6-3. Keeping the match tied however, was the number two team of Hoyt Ludington '88, and Marc Caltibiano '90 who eclipsed their opponents by a score of 6-1, 6-2.

This split set up the drama of the number three doubles match which was the most exciting of the day. Brad Hunt '90 and Pier Friend '88 engaged their Jumbo opponents in a two hour tightrope walk as Eph fans stood captivated. Hunt and Friend took the first set 7-6 (7-5) but lost the second 6-3 and were down a break in the

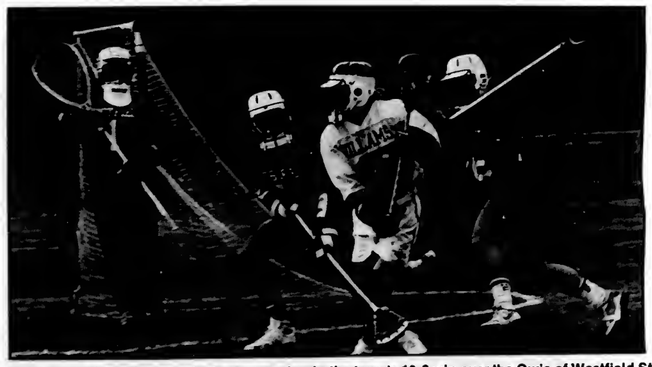
by Sean Brennan

Last week as the citizens of Key West, Florida were trying to regain control of their town and Durty Harry's was buying new artwork to decorate its empty walls, the White Dogs of Williams were back at home after showing the southern boys that the northerners could do more than win wars.



The Ephs played two games at both James Madison University and Emory University which proved that even without much practice, the maroon and gold could field a fearless fifteen that could stand up to any trial or tribulation, whether a hard-hitting JMU team or a tough Emory squad.

With a little more experience, the tough and tan club travelled to Cambridge town this weekend to battle the Harvard Crimson. After demonstrating their subtle social style throughout the Harvard campus on Friday night, the Eph A-side came onto the pitch on a beautiful Saturday morning ready to play. Although not a picture-perfect match for the White Dogs, there were several spontaneous bursts of good rugby that led the A's to a decisive 22-6 victory.

The first try was touched down by Roger Merriam '87 after he got a pass from a patented Mark Tompkins '87 breakaway. Merriam came out of the swim to kick the conversion and make it 6-0. Following two penalty kicks by Harvard, the score was tied at 6-6, but an inspired pack led the Ephs back to the lead as Gene Mazzaro '87, Mike Goldstein '88, Chris Palmedo '89 and Nils Christoffersen '88 got the ball to Dennis Newcomber '87, who put in to raise the score to 10-6.

It wasn't long until the front eight were inspired once again as the Williams pack simply overwhelmed the Crimson forwards with a crushing push and a well-timed wheel as Gene

'Letdown' dooms laxmen to 7-6 defeat

by Marc McDermott

The 1-1 men's lacrosse team let a close one slip away against Tufts, but displayed a potential for greatness that it exhibited in its southern trip and in last week's 19-3 drubbing of Westfield State.

The Ephs dominated East Coast Athletic Conference foe Tufts through the first three quarters of the game. Paced by senior Steve Patterson (2 goals) and freshman Bob Santry (2 goals, 2 assists) the Ephs held a seemingly safe 6-3 lead. The Jumbo attack then caught fire, scoring 4 goals in the fourth period and two in the final minute despite the fine netminding of Robbie Lambert '90 who recorded 15 saves. The final two goals took the Ephs' lead away and gave the Jumbos a thrilling 7-6 victory.

"It was just a complete letdown, offensively and defensively," explained coach Renzie Lamb. "Even though Robbie played hard, we weren't tough at the end."

Captain Taylor Watts '87 echoed Lamb's feelings saying, "We beat them for 56 minutes and then just let up. We missed Dave Carpenter and John Edie to injuries and Tim Oliver was in the infirmary and Doug Gilbert played sick so that hurt us."

The Ephmen had no problem earlier against Westfield St. The Ephs commanded the field, throwing up an incredible 66 shots with Tim Oliver compiling four goals. Patterson and Santry each had three goals and an assist.

"They played well but were undermanned," said Lamb. "We came out as good as we did against Tufts and just dominated the game." The Owls could only manage eight shots on goal to counter the Ephs as goalies Lambert and Dana Weeder '88 played well having three and two saves respectively.

The Ephs next play at Dartmouth on Wednesday and then at the Bantams of Trinity on Saturday.

Lisa Tenerowicz '88 eludes a Tufts defender in the team's 13-8 loss to the Medford women. Mara Burnett '88 tallied three goals and Mo Flaherty had two in the loss. A 5-0 Tufts spurt near the end of the first half was the difference. The Ephwomen dropped to 0-2 after an earlier loss to Springfield. (Gannon)

Cyclists paced by Danielson at Drew

The Williams cycling team competed Saturday against 20 northern colleges and universities at the Drew University Criterium. The 21.6 mile race consisted of 12 laps around a rolling course highlighted by two hairpin turns.

Karin Johnson '89 had a strong start in the women's race and held on to take 12th place as the powerful West Point and Cornell riders set a devastating pace.

In the men's B race, Princeton attacked with only three miles to finish. Paul Danielson '88 led the chase after the two breakaway riders, but met with failure as the leaders' teammates successfully cut to the front of the peloton to block and slow the pursuit. In the final pack sprint, the junior came in 20th with Michael Grow '90 in 21st, an awesome freshman performance for such a high pressure criterium. The other Eph hopeful, Kevin Ellingwood '89, who is recovering from a dislocated shoulder, retired from the field after 10 miles.

Next weekend Williams will travel to Cornell for a two-day stage race.

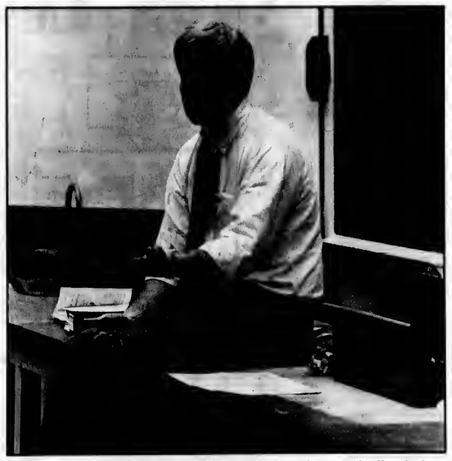
10 students attend CEP open forum



by Jocelyn Shadforth

An increase in distribution requirements and the institution of an optional tutorial program were the topics at an open meeting for students sponsored by the CEP last Wednesday night. Turnout for the meeting was low with about 10 students attending.

CEP Chairman Thomas Jorling opened up the discussion of the tutorial program by describing the present proposal, which calls for each department to offer at least one tutorial with enrollment limited to 10 students.

Preference would be given to sophomores and the students would be divided into five pairs, he said. Each pair would meet separately with the professor.

During the tutorial one student would give an oral presentation based on readings and an essay prepared specifically for the meeting. After the presentation the two students would discuss the material with the professor.

Committee on Educational Policy chairman Thomas Jorling led an open forum to discuss the distributional requirements and tutorial proposals last Wednesday. Student attendance was low, with about 10 students showing up. (Camp)

Frequent writing and speaking

"Tutorials will give the students opportunities to write frequently and speak frequently. They will bring these benefits to later coursework and to general intellectual life at the College,"

State grant awarded to N. Adams for museum

Plans for a "Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art and Museum of Contemporary Architecture" (Mass MoCA), a proposal developed by the College, received a boost in the form of a recent grant of $30,000 awarded to the City of North Adams by the state Executive Office of Communities and Development.

The money will be used to study the legal and economic impact of development of the museum in the Sprague Electric Company's Marshall Street complex.

The idea for developing a museum in the Sprague complex has been explored for over a year by Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art, in conjunction with North Adams Mayor John Barrett.

The museum would be operated by the WCMA; the art on display would be either owned by WCMA or borrowed through long-term loans under its auspices.

During the past six months, WCMA has been exploring the possibility of bringing to Mass MoCA a significant portion of one of the largest and perhaps finest collections of contemporary art in the world.

The collection, owned and assembled by Dr. Giuseppe Panza of Milan and Varese in Italy, consists primarily of American art from the 1960s and 1970s, and would occupy about 180,000 square feet in the museum complex. Dr. Panza has given Williams preliminary assurances that part of his collection will be placed in the museum on long term loan if the project comes to fruition.

In another development related to the permanent collection of Mass MoCA, WCMA has reached a preliminary agreement with the German Architecture Museum in Frankfurt, West Germany, for the long term loan of a major portion of its permanent collection of modern and contemporary architectural drawings and models, and for a programmatic collaboration on exhibitions, if the development takes place.

Smith eschews merit prizes, says need is key

by Peter Balaban

Director of Admissions Philip Smith reiterated his belief last week that need-based financial aid is an essential in maintain component of merit-based admissions. Smith, who wrote an article on the subject for the November-December issue of Academe magazine, also said that he remains firmly opposed to merit scholarships, which draw on a finite pool of financial aid money.

"Financial aid should be available to ... students who would otherwise not be able to afford Williams," said Smith. He said that the availibility of aid broadens the applicant pool.

If a college were to use its aid money to buy bassoonists or athletes who can afford to come anyway, said Smith, it would be denying other qualified people the opportunity to attend.

"Diversification and democritization"

In his article, Smith wrote that meritocratic, need-blind admissions policies "have been important agents of diversification and democratization" at private institutions.

As the portion of the budget devoted to merit awards rises, less money is available to meet aid needs, according to Smith.

Smith also pointed out that merit awards do not appear to increase the numbers of students who decide to enroll at institutions that offer them. "With all the equity issues aside, I don't see it as an effective marketing tool."

He said there are a limited number of high ability students in the country, and if every college offered merit scholarships, these students would still go to the same schools. "The prestige hierarchy will prevail over money," Smith said.

Increase in quality and quantity

According to Smith, there does not seem to be any hard evidence supporting the idea that high ability students are being drawn away from private institutions to state schools by merit scholarships. On the contrary, he said, the quality and number of applications to Williams have increased despite a national decrease in college-aged students.

Smith pointed out that Williams students pay only 40 percent of real tuition costs, and that the remainder is covered by the college's endowment. He said also that financial aid is second only to faculty salaries in the total Williams budget.

Decreases in federal aid and increases in tuition do represent potential strains on a need-blind admissions policy, said Smith. But he said the college Board of Trustees reaffirmed two weeks ago their commitment to meeting the demonstrated financial need of accepted students.

Admissions accepts more minorities

by Peter Balaban and Paul Kwon

Last week the Admissions Office admitted 1113 students to the Class of 1991 out of a record high 5098 applicants. The percentage of students who were accepted declined from 24.4 percent last year to 21.8 percent.

"If you look at the schools that we're competing with, they're up in the number of applications, too," Assistant Director of Admissions Richard Nesbitt said.

"One reason we had an increase is that we are reaching more students in our nationwide student search program. Our accepts show a wider geographic distribution than in the past," he said. "We've gotten good publicity and increased name recognition."

The number of acceptances was reduced slightly this year, according to Nesbitt, because Williams expects a higher percentage of accepted students to enroll. But he added, "Figures indicate that we may have a lower yield — we're dealing with a wider geographical area. Historically, we've had less success from distant areas."

Director of Admissions Philip Smith called the decision to accept fewer applicants somewhat of a gamble on the college's part.

Approximately 55 percent of accepted candidates were men.

In all, 133 were accepted in December under the early decision program, 169 were accepted in January and February because of their outstanding records, and 801 students were accepted in April. Ten students accepted in previous years who deferred admission will also be part of the incoming Class of 1991.

In a letter to high school counselors, Smith wrote "I am impressed with the national and international character of the Williams applicant group this year. We noticed distinct shifts away from the Northeast in the applicants.

"More distinctive, however, was the outstanding quality of the entire applicant group," the letter said. "All 5098 completed applicants averaged out to 612 on the verbal and 655 on the math, for example, with achievement scores and class ranks also at a higher level than in prior years."

Fifty-three percent of all applicants applied for financial aid, and 61 percent of the accepted students were aid applicants, both increases from last year. Williams has been able to meet the demonstrated financial need of all accepted applicants, according to Smith.

The numbers of minorities who applied and the number accepted both increased this year, especially among Hispanics, said Smith. Twenty-five percent of those acceptanced were minorities.

Smith noted that the rate of those who decide to enroll is usually lower for minorities, and he expects 18 to 20 percent of the Class of 1991 to consist of minority students, the highest percentage in Williams history.

Nesbitt said that the college expects 509 students to enroll, six less than last year, which was the largest class in Williams' history. If more students are needed to fill places in the incoming freshman class, applicants will be accepted from the waiting list.

"We do have a very strong waiting list. We wouldn't be losing anything by drawing students from the list," Nesbitt said. This year, 522 candidates have been placed on the list, compared with 506 last year.

Looking forward to tutorials

Faculty members should cast a resounding "yes" vote next Wednesday to the proposal for a program of optional tutorials.

The proposal, formulated over the past four months by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), would create tutorials in all college departments offering majors. It would target them for sophomores, but not make them a requirement.

Tutorials would function as a valuable alternative learning environment for students, and would do much to improve intellectual bonds between individual students and faculty members, as the CEP has outlined.

Tutorials would take the place of some discussion courses in certain departments. But the CEP's proposal does not threaten the status of discussion courses of 20 students or fewer as the primary structure of learning at Williams. That is appropriate; students have much to learn from one another.

The optional nature of the tutorial venture will probably be the key to its success, both next week before the faculty, and in practice two years from now.

Optional tutorials would be an opportunity for a student to choose a field in which he or she held an intellectual commitment, and work closely with a professor in that field — before commiting themselves to a major. For some students, it could make choosing a major less of a guessing game and more of an informed choice.

Though the CEP's working paper is generally well thought-out, there are several gaps in it which the faculty should recognize and devise means to deal with — before the program is implemented:

- One of these potential difficulties is in the area of compensation for faculty time. Under the CEP's plan, a department would be compensated for the "loss" of faculty hours only if that department offered more than the one required tutorial course. There is a danger that this could become an incentive for certain departments to over-tutorialize, especially in the initial years of the project. Many smaller departments already offer discussion courses with handfulls of students in them; if the structure of compensation means that more (tutorials) is better, a significant number of these small group courses could be wiped out.

Perhaps the faculty should impose limits on the total number of tutorials that can be offered within a department. Like the optional status, one of things that makes the tutorial program feasible is the assumption that tutorials aren't "taking over."

- There is a second area which should concern the faculty on a more fundamental level. The framers of the tutorial proposal see it as a means to attack problems with participation in small group courses. "Many students do not get enough practice at intellectual debate," the report says. "Even at Williams, there are students who manage to avoid discussing the central ideas of their studies; in a tutorial there is simply no place to hide."

It is troubling that the CEP has entered into this line of thinking in its report without further exploring the problem itself. The proposal does not address strategies to make changes in the discussion courses themselves. Tutorials are seemingly a band-aid on a larger open sore.

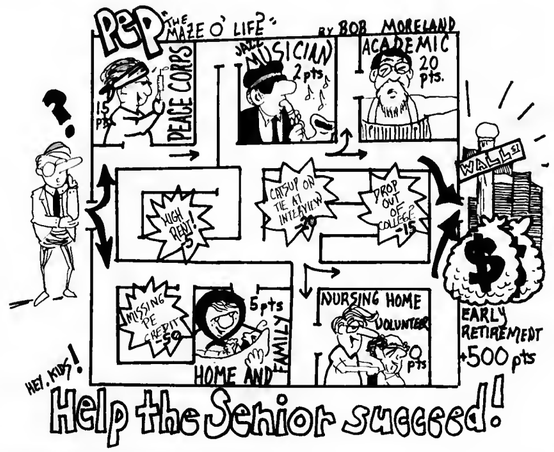
As they vote and after they vote, the faculty should think about such questions as these: will tutorials be an elite learning experience in a sea of average-Joe courses? Won't the students who currently "hide" in discussion courses be likely to simply not take a tutorial?

The solution to this last question is not to make tutorials a requirement. The CEP has found such a scheme unworkable. So while faculty members must be vigilant about keeping tutorials optional, they should also ponder the questions raised almost inadvertently by the CEP report. Ways to improve discussion courses and to lower class sizes would be good topics for the CEP to take up next year.

The difficulty gap

At the same meeting next Wednesday, the faculty are expected to vote on a proposal to increase divisional requirements from two to three courses in each of the current three divisions. They should reject this proposal.

The practical effect of the proposal — as acknowledged in the CEP working paper — would be to increase student exposure to Division III disciplines. Such an increase is the primary goal of the committee's plan.



The proposal, however, is flawed in its fundamental approach to the problem of Division III enrollment. The problem — and thus the solution — lies in the kinds of courses offered by the science departments. Most science departments offer two types of courses open to students without prerequisite. On the one hand, they offer non-major, non-lab courses intended for students with limited interest in further pursuit of the subject. On the other, they offer rigorous introductory courses that serve as the first step in the major sequence. Few courses bridge the considerable difficulty gap that exists between these two extremes.

The answer, then, is to create a set of intermediate level courses that will fill the void left by current offerings. Such new courses would require labs on a weekly basis, just as introductory major courses do now. But they would not be taught with the implicit assumption that all enrolled students are interested in pursuing the subject after the end of the semester. Such a course would allow students to explore a scientific discipline on a serious, laboratory-based level but without the considerable commitment required by introductory major courses.

The current proposal, therefore, misses the mark in its attempt to address the problem currently posed by course enrollments. The problem lies not in our requirements, but in our courses.

Letters

MassPIRG

To the Editor:

In recent weeks, MASSPIRG volunteers have urged students to write to Congressman Silvio Conte to ask him to support the State Nuclear Safety Participation Act of 1987 (H.R.499), proposed by Rep. E. Markey. Conte responded by cosponsoring the bill, which represents a serious step toward a safe energy future.

The bill requires state involvement in the development of Evacuation Planning Zones for nuclear power plants and will provide for state veto power over the issuance of operating licenses to pending plants if their operation "would be inconsistent with the protection of the public health and safety in the state."

This action for safer energy sources resulted from the controversy of the Seabrook, N.H. nuclear power plant. As currently required by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, evacuation plans must be submitted by state officials whose jurisdiction lies within a ten-mile radius of a nuclear power plant. Governor Dukakis did not submit such plans, as he rightly felt it was impossible to evacuate communities in the very populous region around Seabrook.

The NRC, in an attempt to bypass Dukakis, proposed that the Evacuation Planning Zone be reduced to one mile, thus making evacuation planning the sole reserve of pro-nuclear Governor Sununu of New Hampshire. In so doing, the NRC showed its willingness to compromise our safety.

MASSPIRG urges students to continue their support of H.R. 499. Letters to either Conte or other memebers of the House can only serve to help. To furhter awareness, MASSPIRG is sponsoring the multi-media presentation "Circles Around the Fire" on April 22 at 7:30 PM in Biology 111

Misquote

To the Editor:

I would like to address misconceptions that may have been raised by the two inaccurate quotations that appeared on page one of the April 14th issue of the Record. On April 9th the four officers of the College Council met with members of the Committee on Campus Life of the Board of Trustees.

In my introduction of the three issues we chose to discuss, I expressed the officers' sentiment that drawing more women and minorities to teach at Williams should be an ongoing objective of the college. In this context I related the figures of the total number of women and minorities that are associate professors and full professors. I explained that the officers felt that broadening the eligibility requirements for the CAP would be a specific way to attack the problem of creating a more diverse faculty.

During the course of our meeting the trustees showed that they shared our belief that the racial and gender composition of the Williams faculty is an important issue. Some came to us individually after the the meeting to hear the numbers again. However, to say that the trustees were "astounded" with the numbers is a definite overstatement of their surprise and is something that I never said in the course of my interview with the Record.

More importantly, to say that the trustees "were in support of our proposal to open up the membership of the CEP to all tenured professors" is unambiguously incorrect. While the Trustees were enthusiastic and thoughtful about our efforts to address the broad issue of the composition of the faculty, and some individually expressed support for our CAP proposal after the meeting, in our group discussion we did not even discuss the specific CAP elegibility proposal. The committee did not express group support for the specific proposal; we never even discussed it.

The members of the Committee on Campus Life were gracious hosts and demonstrated a sincere interest in the issues we raised. I look forward to a cooperative and productive relationship with them. It is a terrible misfortune that outcomes of our discussion were misrepresented to the administration, to students, and to members of the committee. Thus, it was necessary that these misquotations be clarified. Thank you for giving me this opportunity.

Correction

An article in last week's Record on the Board of Trustees' meeting incorrectly quoted College Council President Carter Zinn '88 as saying, "The trustees were astounded by figures of the composition of the faculty," and "The Trustees were in support of our proposal to open up the membership of the CAP to all tenured professors." Zinn did not make either statement. The Record regrets the error.

Generosity in Harlan County

by Brian Watson '88

A group of sixteen Williams students and alums, led by College Chaplain Reverend Carol Pepper, spent the first half of their spring break at the Cranks Creek Survival Center in Cranks Creek, Harlan County, Kentucky. Our trip was funded in part from a gift from the Mission and Outreach Committee of the First Congregational Church in Williamstown, in part with funding from the College, and in part through our own contribution. There was a lot for us to do, and there continues to be a lot, but we did what we could.

In five days we helped to give the Center a spring cleaning, to paint its buildings, and clean its grounds. When the load of five and one-half tons of donated fertilizer and seed potatoes arrived in Harlan we trucked it to the Center, and the next day we distributed it to the families in the community. We painted five houses and helped put a roof and floor in one building. We began construction of a porch and dug out a ditch for a sewer line. We painted a small church and made a few friends as well.

It took us a while to realize just how much we had done and how much we received from them. We went wanting to do something for the people, but they gave more, much more, to us. We learned about their way of life, in meeting, for example, a young man who, at age nineteen, had spent two years working in the coal mines. And a young woman, who at twenty-one had been married for six years and was raising two children.

They gave us a sense of what time means to them, that rushing and schedules aren't really necessary. Things get done, not by magic, but simply because people keep on working toward their goal. This may have been the hardest thing for us to assimilate; after all, most of us at Williams give a lot of energy to organizing spurts of activity so as to maximize our free time. The most important thing they gave us was their trust and acceptance.

The first person we met when we arrived at the Center was Bobby Simpson. Bobby was a congenial person who loved to try to trick us with small jokes and puns. "Lyin'," he called it. The next morning we met his wife Becky. She helped us to get a handle on the work we were doing there when she said, "When I first started working with the Center, giving out food, I began to see that there was hunger everywhere. I thought that what we were doing was just a drop in the ocean. Now I just hope that someday we'll all feel like a waterfall."

Harlan County, Kentucky, is not an ordinary place. Deep within Appalachia, one cannot go for five miles without seeing some manifestation of a coal-mining operation or a church.

The first town one comes to on Route 421 entering the state is Cranks Creek.

Strip mining by coal operators had been an integral part of this area from the mid-'sixties to the late seventies, but its effects were immediate and long-lasting. The contour of the mountains around Cranks Creek changed rapidly. The operators cut vertical shelves into the mountains, piling up the trees, dirt, and boulders they removed below them on the mountainside. They made a series of dams and high walls down the mountain; but when heavy rains came in 1977, the walls and dams broke.

The water rushed down the mountains and one by one the smaller dams broke. Finally the large dams broke as well. In the years following that first flood in 1977, the floods destroyed the homes of more than seventy families and tore the topsoil off their land. Some people barely got out with their lives.

In the aftermath a few people banded together to fight to reclaim what had been theirs. Helping to drive this effort was Becky Simpson, wife and mother of six. She helped organize local families and found a lawyer willing to take their case against the Kentucky state government, powerfully influenced by the coal lobby. The first lawsuit was won and seventeen families received a total of $130,000 in compensation.

After the flood in 1977, the Housing and Urban Development Office in Washington began to help. The first year $925,000 was sent to help restore the land. Three years ago $13,000,000 was slotted for the reclamation projects. The Carter Administration gave estimates that the contours of the mountains would be restored by 1993. According to Becky, however, nothing was done last year to continue the project.

With the help of her husband Bobby and several friends and neighbors, Becky started the Cranks Creek Survival Center. The Center has helped families to claim the assistance they need, whether it be seed and fertilizer, clothing and food, paint and lumber, or just manpower. Becky and Bobby at the ZCenter continue to stand ready to help in any way they can.

Our secular society needs to tolerate the beliefs of others

by Dilip Nair '88

The news media and the conversations of many have turned their focus in the last few weeks to that body of Christians that is loosely labelled "fundamentalist." I am prompted to write this piece because I feel it is relevant for us at Williams to consider more carefully the question of "fundamentalism" and the reactions various people have to it — relevant because a portion of our community leads an active spiritual life and needs to be understood if our relationships are to be healthy ones.

It would be a safe assumption to make that the word "fundamentalist" evokes negative reactions for many people. I would like to draw my reader's attention to some of these.

There are those reactions that arise out of wariness and disapproval of what I will call "religious fervor." It cannot be denied that in the history of humanity several atrocities and acts of injustice have been committed by people in the name of God. These actions have been committed by people who have professed intense commitment to some religion. "Wariness" and "disapproval" are perhaps justified. Yet ther is another aspect to this that I fear might be forgotten — an issue that I have to contend with as I am a Christian who wants to worship, to love and to serve God woth every fiber of my existence. I have to contend with the shudders and the expressions of alarm that greet my statement that I want to offer myself truly as a "living sacrifice" to God.

I am very conscious of the necessity

Williams should adopt CEP requirements

by Andy Mayer '88

It was pleasant to learn that the Committee on Educational Policy, in proposing to restructure divisional requirements and offer tutorials, considered both faculty and student opinion and published the proposals in last week's Record for further consideration.

Another Word
by Andrew Mayer

In case you missed it, the CEP proposed to require students to take three courses in each division for graduation, two in each division by the end of sophomore year, and two departments must be represented in each division. They also propose to "create the opportunity for students to take at least one tutorial course during their time at Williams."

The time used by the CEP in formulating their proposals was very well spent. Their proposal to increase divisional requirements has been a long time coming and is much better than President Oakley's proposed four divisions and lab science requirement.

The CEP divisional requirement proposal is greatly needed now, as shown by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, which reported that liberal arts degrees are decreasingly rapid. Williams has always been portrayed as a bastion of a liberal arts education and its requirements should reflect that.

I am most impressed with the CEP's recognition that Williams students do not take enough courses in foreign languages and literatures, non-western cultures, and lab and field sciences. While the CEP proposal stops short of requiring such courses, they do recommend that the College promote these areas of study, so the students are more aware of their importance.

I am in favor of a foreign language requirement at Williams. I propose a foreign language requirement based on one-year study of any language. Most students would be able to meet the requirement by passing a test during Freshman Days, but those who can't, would have to take an introductory language course and then pass the test.

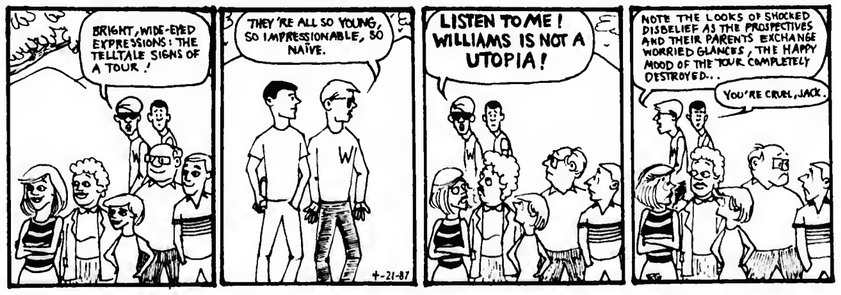
I think it makes sense. Exposure is the key. Simply acquainting students with a foreign language and culture is important. And who knows? Maybe more of us will decide to major in the foreign languages.

The tutorial proposal is also well-founded and greatly need. While the CEP does not propose that tutorials be required, they do make a great case for them, with the tutorials shifting the "intellectual initiative from teacher to student" and create an atmosphere of intellectual intimacy.

What bothers me is that tutorials are not needed to receive these benefits. I would imagine that the majority of upper-level courses have enrollments sufficiently low to create a "tutorial" atmosphere. These opportunities are lost, because the professors do not push students to learn as they would in tutorials.

Unfortunately, what happens here is that students are "required" to read the assignments but are not tested. In many discussion-seminar classes, readings are discarded each week. So much is being lost here. Tutorials are being created to force intellectual engagement not otherwise going on.

I ask that the faculty think about the learning going on in these courses. What is the level of retention among students if they are in no way required to submit their learning to a test? It's obvious from the CEP proposal that something is needed to encourage intellectual thought in these classes.



This proposal means more work for students and faculty alike. Yet, aren't we here to learn and aren't profcssor here to teach?

The CEP should be commended for both its proposals. Through both proposals, though, it is obvious that problems still exist in the Williams academic program.

The faculty will vote on these proposals at their meeting a week from tomorrow, the 29th. I encourage them to pass them, but to realize that they point to greater problems at Williams.

Oxford gains in popularity

by Susanne Abell

The Williams-in-Oxford program appears to be gaining in popularity, as it received more applications this year than it has in previous years.

From the class of 1989, 40 students applied for 31 available spots. Last year all 31 students who applied to the program were accepted

Williams-in-Oxford is currently in its second year of existence and so this year, for the first time, alumni from the program are back on the Williams campus. The return of the first group of students is thought to have encouraged more people to apply this year according to Sheila Spear, assistant dean of the college.

The application process consists of a short essay by the applicant, a transcript of college courses, two faculty recommendations and an interview. The selection committee is made up of five professors and Spear.

40 sophomores applied for the 31 spaces in the Williams-in-Oxford program. The students live in the Ephraim Williams House, pictured above.

In evaluating the candidates, the selection committee looked for the capacity to work independently and the ability to write in a way that reflects that the student can analyze material and come up with a personal synthesis.

"The Oxford applicants are strong students, but most of them come from the large pool of people who get a B average or above but are not the top," Spear said. She noted that the top 20 students in a class usually remain at Williams for their junior year.

"The work at Oxford is qualitatively different but the expectations are equally high", said Spear. There is more flexibility and independence at Oxford because of the tutorial system, she said.

CC discusses grievance committee, CAP makeup

by Debbie Snyder

The College Council last week considered sending a letter to faculty members to solicit their views on the composition of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP). The council also discussed the formation of a grievance committee on racial incidents.

Council President Carter Zinn '88 noted that the CAP has no women or minority members, because elegibility for membership is limited full professors, and almost all full professors are white males. Zinn has proposed that committee membership be opened to all tenured professors, which would make more women and minorities elegible.

Zinn asked council members to solicit their professors' views on the proposal. He said that a list of council members would be distributed to the Williams community so that the members could be informed of the community's opinions on the proposal.

"There are two valid reasons for the administration to dump all over this, which I assure you they've done," Zinn said.

Those reasons, he said, are that allowing tenured professors on the committee would possibly put a professor in the situation of deciding on his or her own promotion to full professor, and that being on the CAP requires a lot of experience.

Discussing the formation of a grievance committee, Zinn said that leaders of the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) have talked with administrators about the formation of a similar committee. The members of this committee would be appointed by College

Faculty approves first two CEP submissions

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The faculty passed the first two proposals submitted to it by the Committeee on Educational Policy (CEP) at its meeting last Wednesday.

The proposals, one calling for a nine-course limit on major requirements and the other calling for the institution of major seminars in the junior or senior year, were the first of several that will come before the faculty this spring as the result of the CEP's two-year curriculum review.

CEP chairman Thomas Jorling said that although a limit of nine courses required for the major is acknowledged as the norm, passing the motion would be an extremely important statement on the part of the faculty.

"The CEP is concerned that we have a trend toward an increase in the number of courses in a major, both proposed and in the number of prerequisites for courses in a major," he said.

Jorling said that all prerequisites should count as courses toward the nine-course limit in a major. He noted that there saw forty minutes of ferocious rugby from a spirted Williams fifteen. The Cadets spread the lead to 15-6 with a penalty kick, but Williams budged no more.

The White Dogs finally found their groove as Gene Mazzaro '87 and Bryan Baird '89 worked 'the loop' to get the ball to Gary Sheff '87, who took it in for the first Williams try of the day. With Merriam's conversion, the score was back to a realistic 15-12.

Norwich extended their lead once again with a questionable benefit from the referee to make it 18-12, but the boys of the WRFC decided they had had enough. The stupendous front eight was stirred into a frenzy that climaxed as captain Jeff Heilman '87 took a dish from Baird and took it in for a try. With magnificient Merriam's conversion, the score was tied at 18. It was only fitting as time was waning that Merriam brought the WRFC to victory with a perfect penalty kick and a final score of 21-18.

B-side dominates

The killer B's could do no less than play an inspired game against the Norwich B's, and the show began as Sherwood Smith '89, off a set-up from Andy Anselmi '87, put down a try to put Williams up 4-0. Another try was scored by Mike Sullivan '88 off a pass from Erik Valdes '87 to push the lead to 8-0.

In the second half, Charlie Lazor '87 and Valdes nailed down tries off feeds from Sullivan and Andy Harris '87. Jonny Hollenburg '88 made both conversions to end the game at 20-0. After the C-sides were defeated by the overpowering Green from Dartmouth, everyone headed off for the ferocious festivities to follow.

Profile: Jean-Bernard Bucky

by Michael Barsanti

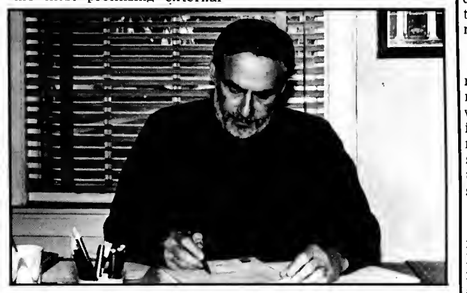
Theatre Professor Jean-Bernard Bucky isn't one for standing still. In his thirteen years at Williams, he has become a vital member of the theatre department, but he is soon going to fly several time zones away to become the new director of the two year old Williams-Oxford program. That's a big change, considering that Bucky has not spent much time in England, not to mention Oxford itself.

This impending change is not Bucky's first unusual career move. He has both a B.S. and an M.S. degree in mathematics, and from 1961 to 1964 he served in the Air Force as a Senior Mathematician at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base. He left the Air Force and went to Carnegie-Mellon University to earn an M.F.A. degree in 1966, focusing on theatre and directing. He explained his seeming lack of reluctance at leaving a set career for a chancier new one by saying, "I changed my mind ... I imagine that if I had been better at it I would have stayed."

After Carnegie-Mellon, Bucky taught at Berkeley for eight years, and served as director of the repertory theatre there in 1973. He came to Williams from Berkeley in 1974, and except for the time he spent as a visiting professor of directing in the drama department at Stanford in 1980 and 1981, he has been here ever since.

Directing

In those thirteen years, he has made quite a difference at Williams. As associate professor in 1974 and 1975, he revised the curriculum of the drama department, including the new production vehicle, Williamstheatre. He developed a proposal for the theatre major, which was instituted in 1976. Bucky has also directed everything from "Waiting for Godot" at Williams to "Madame Butterfly" at the Michigan Opera Theatre in 1978.



These achievements have not kept Bucky from changing his course to direct Williams-Oxford, which he called "one of the most promising external projects that we have." His experience has certainly made Bucky a good choice to head the fledgling Oxford program. Bucky said that most of the dirty work, save a few broken toilets, has already been done by the program's first director, Daniel O'Connor.

Bucky's forthcoming responsibilities will include setting up the program of studies with the Oxford "dons" who teach Williams students, working on a developing library and housing arrangements at the Ephraim Williams House, choosing the next year's students, and figuring out how he will teach in the program himself.

Unique demands

Bucky said he has few inclinations to change the current Oxford program. He said he is happy with the way the program has begun, but that he expects to find all sorts of possibilities for development once he gets to England. It may seem strange that a theatre professor should want to head a program at Oxford, where he wouldn't be doing any theatre, but Bucky said he is drawn by the excitement of the program and the unique demands it makes on students.

To this end, Professor Bucky said he is looking for students who are serious, though not overly so, and who are "venturesome" and willing to

Theatre professor Jean-Bernard Bucky has been named Director of the Williams-Oxford program for two years beginning in July 1987. (Wege)

University of Vermont

The January issue of Playboy magazine ranked the University of Vermont as "the fourth best party school in the nation" and will be recruiting women in the upcoming weeks to pose for a special feature to be called "Women of the Party Schools." Some groups at the college, incensed by the plan, are planning to protest. The Women's Advisory Commitee of UVM is sponsoring a photograph display of women depicting women's strength and diversity, and the Women's Organization and Referral Center is planning a pornography education week.

Franklin & Marshall

28 students who had filed lawsuits against Hallmark Management Service of Ohio, Inc., Franklin & Marshall's dining service, received out-of-court settlements totalling $737,500. The lawsuits were initiated after the students fell victim to salmonella poisoning in the spring of 1984. Although Hallmark paid all medical bills resulting from the outbreak, the 28 students filed suit for pain and suffering. Each student was awarded $2,500 for every day spent in the hospital or the infirmary, while one student, in whom the salmonella triggered an epileptic seizure, received $170,000.

Dartmouth

According to Dean of Admissions Alfred Quirk, the Green received 9400 applications this year, an increase of about 700 over last year. The rise in application numbers is due, in part, to the relatively new phenomena of "multiple applications" said Quirk, and also to positive media coverage of the college this year. Last year's applicant pool was smaller than average due to the coverage Dartmouth received over its anti-apartheid protest disruptions, including the smashing of shanties on the front lawn.

Trinity

The Clement Chemistry Building of Trinity College received a bomb threat on March 12, forcing cancellations of planned evening activities. At 7:35 a.m. a male voice instructed the front desk worker over the phone that a student was planning to set a bomb off in the building at 10 p.m. A search conducted by the Hartford Police found nothing unusual in the chemistry building. According to the college vice president Thomas A. Smith, severe disciplinary actions are being planned for the person who called in the threat.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Record reporters Erik Burns and Alex Oh, from material printed in other campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

Gargoyles enjoy "an open ear at the Dean's Office"

by Erik Burns

The Gargoyle Society is a group of 18 Williams students dedicated to the task of identifying issues of importance to the campus and its community, and discussing those issues in order to find solutions. It is a think tank for members selected through a self-nominating procedure to throw out ideas about current problems, bandy them around, and present their conclusions to the deans, the president, the College Council, and anyone else who will listen.

In recent years the Society has addressed such topics as academic advising, athletics at Williams, peer health counseling, racism and women's issues. In many cases, Gargoyle's weekly meetings have culminated in panel discussions or the formation of a special committee, such as the panel discussion this past fall about Athletics or the recent discussion groups formed following the case of sexual assault on campus.

"Tapping"

The Society prides itself on its diversity and its ability to aid in combatting some of the problems that affect the campus. Although the group is not an elected body, they do have some influence with the general leadership. "We have an open ear at the dean's office and with the president," said Gargoyle member Jordan Hampton '87.

Gargoyle has sometimes been accused of elitism, snobbery, and even secrecy. These accusations are in many ways remnants of Gargoyle traditions, which in the past included lining up the entire junior class in the Science Quad and "tapping" those students chosen as new members. Nowadays Gargoyle is more conservative in its election procedure, choosing members from students who have submitted a self-nomination and essay.

Gargoyle's actions change according to the issue or topic with which they are dealing and with the membership. According to member Hans Hume '87, "There have been years when it's been useless, and years when they've had their noses in everything."

Red tape

Red tape and bureaucracy are things that most groups have to contend with, but "We have no written rules, no set agenda. We can do what we want. If we don't get anything done, it's not good but it's not bad either," said Hampton. "When we have a resolution to a problem we either try to deal with it ourselves or we take it to someone who can."

Copeland plays blues T-bone style

by Peter Balaban

Chapin Hall was rocking to the music of bluesman and guitarist Johnny Copeland last Thursday when Copeland brought a unique mix of Texas blues and African music to Williams. Students were dancing in the aisles, in their seats, and in the windows as the "Texas Twister" and his band stirred the crowd into a near frenzy.

Bobbing and swinging

Copeland opened with three strong blues numbers, backed by a competent five piece band. Shouting the blues, he combined a compelling vocal style with sharp and stirring guitar playing. He was then joined onstage by four musicians from Africa, and together they performed music that synthesized the intricate rhythms and upbeat sounds of that country with rocking Texas electric blues. The result brought the audience dancing to its feet. Even the horns were bobbing and swinging in unison.

Mandingo guitarist Kante Manfila, from Upper Guinea, was simply magnificent, as were Jimmy Leopold Mveie and Fredo Ndoumbe Nganda on tenor sax and trumpet respectively. Percussionist Smith Emile Hallar, from Guadaloupe, was no less impressive.

The band performed incredibly hot versions of "The Jungle" and "Bozalimalamu" from Copeland's critically acclaimed "Bringing It All Back Home" album, the first blues album ever recorded in Africa.

Popped strings

In an interview before the show, Copeland talked about performing the blues live and the excitement of watching an artist create music right on stage. His terrific stage presence was evident in the way he strutted around and gave high fives to people dancing in the first row. Twice during the evening, Copeland popped guitar strings. Without missing a beat, he nonchalantly replaced them and was playing again before the end of the song.

Students were dancing in the aisles, in their seats, and in the windows as the "Texas Twister" and his band stirred the crowd into a near frenzy.

Texas blues, which is a little harder-edged than its Chicago counterpart, is receiving a great deal of attention right now from what Copeland called "the electric medium." Copeland won the 1987 Grammy award for best blues album for "Showdown," his collaboration with guitarists Albert Collins and Robert Cray. Cray's career is skyrocketing, while younger white bands like the Fabulous Thunderbirds and Stevie Ray Vaughn's Double trouble are bringing attention to the tradition.

Tradition from T-bone

Copeland attributes the genesis of the Texas tradition to the the great guitarist T-Bone Walker. "T-Bone was Texas blues, and other blues guitarists patterned themselves after him — he set the trend for everybody — BB King, Gatemouth Brown." He called the blues "an art created by people way back down the road — people did it out of their hearts — when they were happy, when they were sad, when they were working — they had a song to sing."

Copeland said that Texas blues is distinguishable from other blues styles by the way the bluesman flavors his music, as if he was flavoring his cooking. He also said that the blues should be updated musically and lyrically and "quit being so traditional — we don't try to add nothing to it." His synthesis of African and American traditional music has certainly been a step in the right direction.

Tradition

According to Hampton, there is no evidence of Gargoyle's think tank or discussion group interfering with or undermining the actions of other campus groups, including the student-elected College Council. There is a fair amount of interplay between the factions, evidenced by the presence of campus leaders such as former College Council President Amy Jeffress '87 in the Gargoyle Society. Said Hampton, "What does it matter which committee gets something done as long as it happens?"

In fact, the Gargoyle Society has spawned a large number of campus organizations, including the Purple Key Society and the College Council, since its inception as an honor society in 1895. Humes admits to a certain amount of exclusivity in the group but likens it to being a JA, only "less of a big deal." "There's a lot of tradition, a certain amount of pride. But wee don't have secret meetings in black cloaks at the top of Jesup."

"strike out on new things of their own."

The chief method of teaching at Oxford is the tutorial, in which a handful of students work intensively with one professor on several essays written over the course of a term. Bucky said he supports the proposal for a tutorial system based on Oxford's now under consideration at Williams. Bucky noted that the strength of the tutorial, at Oxford and hopefully here, is its way of forcing people into a situation where they learn "to speak forcefully and clearly."

Not in a groove

So far, Williams students have been successful in the tutorial system. Bucky acknowledged that at first instructors at Oxford can "be skeptical about the motives of American students, especially since their largest contact with Americans is as tourists," but added that most "dons" have been "extraordinarily impressed" with the calibre and diligence of Williams students.

As director of the Oxford program, Bucky will be leading people who reflect his own personality: energetic and talented, but not content with staying in a groove. If he succeeds at Oxford he will do much to make the program thrive, as he has done with Williams' theatre. Any attempt to guess the unpredictable Bucky's next move would be a futile one.

Realize

To the Editor:

Now, sadly, I realize that the stereotyping that leads to misunderstanding and racist tension really is a major problem on this campus. To make matters worse, these disparaging stereotypes come directly from the top: they come from the deans' office.

I'm referring, of course, to the thoughtless comments by Dean Kenyatta about the Mission Park and its inhabitants in last week's Record. In one sweeping statement Ms. Kenyatta pigeonholed a large portion of the student body into a very insulting and untrue stereotype. With no apparent regard for the consequences of her comments, or to her duty to represent the whole college community, she glibly stated that the students in Mission Park fall into the "dominant ethos of party party beer and don't try to do anything different."

I take issue to this ridiculous statement. First of all, when was the last time Ms. Kenyatta actually came down to the Park and took a good look around? The dominant ethos in Mission Park is trying to get a hot shower one time in ten! Far worse, though, is Ms. Kenyatta's comment that we "don't try to do anything different." Obviously, residents of this dorm are as diverse as any group of red-blooded American college students.

Truth be told, Dean Kenyatta, Mission residents are not just a bunch of lemmings following the smell of keg beer. So, why not drive your car down to beautiful Mission Park parking lot, pack a lunch for the trip up to the dorm, take a cold shower to open your eyes (we do every morning.), and then get back to the deans' office to work on some of the real problems on this campus.

Seth Rabinowitz '89

Bad week

To the Editor:

It must have been a bad week for the dean's office. What else could explain the mixture of confusion and ignorance which emanated from it?

To start with, Dean Mary Kenyatta exceeded her responsibility and took it upon herself to pass judgement on a large sector of the campus. Calling the "dominant ethos" of Mission Park "party party beer" is a gross overstatement, ,and claiming that sophomores there "really don't try to do anything different" is both ignorant and insulting. The many athletes, scholars, artists, and others who comprise the Park bear witness to its diversity. Stereotyping the typical resident of any house is as dangerous as racism — and as blind to reality. We should attempt to rid this campus of all such feelings, and the place to start such a cleansing is at the top.

In a separate article concerning the new party policy, the deans further confused an already somewhat complex situation. Many had wondered whether quarter kegs or beerballs were allowable in suite parties. Kenyatta ended all doubt by saying that they were not. Paragraphs later Dean Stephen Fix apparently reopened the question, commenting that the deans' office never knows about many parties and inviting us to draw our "own conciuslons." He indicated that parties which caused no problems would be left alone.

What does he mean? What exactly, is a party with a problem? If Dean Fix truly means for us to draw our own conclusions, will he also contribute money to the unfortunate hosts fined $100 by a security officer that might merely stumble on a party? Guessing wrong in "keg roulette" is quite an expensive proposition.

Until communication is bettered; prejudice, removed; and contradiction, eliminated; the college will remain confused and divided.

Fundamentalism

that my "fervor" be always combined with rationality, also God-given, I believe. By rationality I mean the awareness of inconsistencies within one's "world view." I am also deeply aware of the importance of spiritual and intellectual honesty — a willingness to seek Truth among these tensions. This awareness makes these 'shudders' and 'expressions of alarm' more painful.

I fear that we might have forgotten that it is not a bad thing to have a deep conviction — least of all about God!

Another source of negative reactions to "fundamentalists" is a perception of them as spiritually arrogant and intolerant. These as arising from the vocal "condemnation" of people, actions, and even of places that is issued by some of those associated with the label "fundamentalist." Such people have been abusive, disrespectful, and even vindictive on occasion. However, there is another side to the matter that might be overlooked too often.

As somebody who seeks to draw closer into the presence of God, I want to distance myself from what I perceive to be sinful in God's eyes — I want to hate sin. I cannot ignore it for that would not be honest to either myself or to God. I want to be firm in my convictions and to consistent in them. So I cannot remain silent in the face of sinful actions.

Let me hasten to add, however, that as a Christian seeking to be Christ-like, I am compelled not to reject those whom I perceive to be sinning. Rather, I seek to be able to engage them in dialogue so as to not only put forward, in a respectful and rational way, my objections to their actions, but also to seek to understand them. Lest this ound too good to be true, point out that I find it incredibly difficult to, in effect, separate sin from sinner. It is an ability, however, that I find I am improving in as I grow in my own personal spiritual life. So, as I am more and more aware of the necessity for a constant, critical self-examination before God and also of the compulsion to speak out for what I hold to be true, I am distressed that perhaps in an effort not to disturb others (and ourselves) we are silent and are dishonest to both ourselves and to the people around us.

I appeal then to my reader to stop for a moment before he bor she uses the label "fundamentalist" and to consider whether, in fact, the object of the label truly deserves condemnation.

As I think about what I have written, it occurs to me that the article is laden with the pronoun "I"! It has not been my intention to fall into egoism. In fact, I have drawn so heavily on my personal perceptions and have indicated them as such, precisely to convey that I am aware that there are many others who do not share my views. I also want to make it known that I am willing to hear them.

Jorling said.

Students expressed concern about how well science courses would fit into this type of course. "I frankly find the prospect of tutorials in physics frightening," Eric Glattstein '87 said.

It was noted that the Physics Department will institute tutorials next year before the CEP proposal is implemented.

Distribution requirements

The discussion of distribution requirements was also opened by a review by Jorling. He said that many colleges and universities are undertaking a review of general requirement in an effort to improve their curriculum.

The current distribution proposal would require students to complete three courses in each division with two of these courses in each division completed by the end of the sophomore year. In addition, division courses would have to be completed from at least courses listed under at least two different courses prefixes.

"We offer a rich curriculum and we can only afford to offer it if it's taken advantage of," Jorling said. "We can't have faculty offering courses no one takes."

He noted that many students already fulfill the new Division I and II requirements while the new Division III requirement would change student behavior.

Why jump to three?

David Kane '88 said "I understand the need for division requirements but I don't understand the jump from two to three."

Jorling responded, "Many students who pass through Williams College take courses about science or take courses competing in the course enrollment competition. They are not learning science. We're persuaded that an additional science course is a good thing."

The problem of enrollments in the science was also discussed. Jorling said, "We shouldn't contribute to students leaving here saying that science is a mystery."

"I just want the CEP to say this is paternalism," Kane said. Jorling responded, "We're paternal at the macro level, but definitely not at the micro level."

These proposals will be voted on by the faculty at the April 29th faculty meeting.

Admissions

In his letter, Smith said that normally 15 to 30 members of each entering class are admitted from the waiting list. However, the number fluctuates: three years ago, 78 were admitted from the list, two years ago none were admitted and last year 14 were.

Nesbitt said he expects that about 50 percent of the waitlisted applicants will wish to remain on the list. Students on the waiting list will hear final decisions before July 1, he said.

"I'm not going to step out of this," Zinn said. "I want to be able to say to the leaders of the BSU what the consensus of the College Council is and what we can support."

Zinn said that a grievance committee organized by the WBSU could become essentially another WBSU, and that it was important that the council contribute its ideas.

"I guess the alternative is saying we have no power to help the student body, and I guess I'm not willing to say that," Zinn said.

would be some exceptions to this rule, particularly in mathematics, languages and interdisciplinary programs.

"It seems extraordinary to me to pass a motion that would invalidate such a large number of majors," Mathematics Professor Kim Bruce said. He noted that there are 10 to 13 majors that would violate this rule.

Assistant Professor of Mathematics William Lenhart also objected to the motion. "It seems wrong to me to set a number and to have that number be nine," he said.

The faculty passed both motions by a voice vote.

Women's '90 boat drowns Little 3 foes for first place

by Chuck Samuelson

On Saturday, Williams ventured down to Middletown, CT to test the waters at the Little Three regatta. The Ephs, however, came up short in the face of a strong performance by Wesleyan. Williams' only victory came in the freshmen women's race. They improved their record to 4-3 by winning the Captain's Plate in 6:38, ten seconds ahead of Wesleyan and 25 seconds ahead of Amherst.

The varsity women, however, were not as fortunate as their younger counterparts. Their record fell to 4-3 as they were hampered by a crab with 750 meters to go. The mistake allowed Wesleyan and Amherst to pull ahead and the Cardinals to win the Elizabeth Neil trophy in 6:11.

Both the JV men and the JV women lost to Wesleyan — Amherst did not enter a boat in either division. The freshmen heavyweight fell to 6-1, losing the Bill McGraw race by a six second margin. Coach Peter Wells said that the freshmen could have pulled off a victory if they had stuck to their game plan. Despite their disappointing loss, he said that "they will bounce back and catch Wesleyan by the end of the season."

The men's varsity race was a clash between a Wesleyan team with a perfect record and an equally unblemished team from Williams. Wesleyan kept the goose egg on the right as the Ephs' record fell to 6-1. Despite the loss, coach Wells was pleased with his team's performance. "I can't say that I was really that surprised. Wesleyan is probably the top New England crew. They've beaten everybody by at least 15 seconds," he said. Wells said that any time under 5:40 is "phenomenal" and that Wesleyan's winning time of 5:27 was "just unbelievable."

Next week, Williams will face the University of Massachusetts and a much improved team from Lowellin a home regatta in Pittsfield.

Smith

"We have commitments and wouldn't cut anyone off" if the policy were ever reversed, Smith said.

In the Academe article, Smith wrote, "The advantages of a need-based admissions policy to a college like Williams are tangible and real. A broader base of the nation's brightest students has made a discernible difference on our campus, both within the classroom and in the increased richness of the overall residential and extracurricular life."

Mud can't stop women's rugby vs. Harvard

by Steph Jacon

Cesspool rugby made its Williams debut on Saturday as the WWRFC battled scrappy Ivy League opposition on mud-covered fields at Bridgewater State. The A-side steamrolled its Harvard opponents, 19-0, while the B-side fought the Yale Bulldogs to a 0-0 tie.

Oozy slime turned the A-side match into a classic scrum battle. Hooker Shawn Moodey '87 anchored the white pack's effort by winning virtually every scrum down. Late in the first half, Williams was awarded a penalty ten meters from the Harvard try zone. Williams took full advantage of the opportunity as Katie Gerber '88, aided by the tenacious pushing of the scrum, touched the ball down in the smelly turf of the try zone to open the scoring, 4-0. Several minutes later, the Ephwomen found themselves in the same situation. Mary Petersen '87 converted an awesome penalty kick to end the half at a 7-0 score.

The white line drove the ball deep into Harvard territory in the opening minutes of the second half. Accurate passes from standoff Haley Clifford '87 allowed lineys Annie D. Cordova '88 and Jean Janson '88 to gain valuable yardage until Williams was just meters away from the Harvard zone. Scrummies Sara Finnemore '87, Noreen Harrington '88 and Sonja Lengnick '88 provided animalistic rucking and mauling. Sloppy Harvard play resulted in another penalty opportunity. Scrumhalf Steph Jacon '87, backed by the mud-covered scrum, crashed into the try zone for the second try. Petersen converted to make the score 13-0.

The final try featured a stupendous effort by the entire Williams line. The ball travelled expertly down the diagonal to sophomore speedster Kerry Kliander who evaded numerous Harvard women in a ten meter run into the try zone. Petersen continued her accurate kicking by converting, making the final tally 19-0. The win boosts the team's record to 1-0-1 after last week's tie against Boston College.

The B-side played excellent defense against a much larger Yale squad. Lauren Boeschenstein '89 saved the day for the Williams 15 several times by booting the ball out from deep in Eph territory. The white scrum denied numerous Yale attacks in the second half by continually getting their hands under the ball. Cathy Paper '89 and Julie Norton '89 provided devastating pushes in the rucks.

Heather Adams '90, Liz Martin '90 and Jane Amidon '88 all unleashed brutal tackles to ground the Bulldogs. Ann Arnason '89 displayed crafty kicks and driving runs in her rugby debut. The squad's record stands at 0-1-1 after a hard fought 4-0 loss to Boston College last week.

2-2 men's lacrosse edges Trinity in OT

Led by the play of freshman goalie Rob Lambert, the 2-2 Ephs' men's lacrosse squad downed a pesky Trinity team 6-5 in overtime Saturday. Ranked fifth in New England, Williams lost a late 5-3 lead, but rebounded to win in OT on a Doug Gilbert '89 goal.

With the field "in terrible shape," according to coach Renzie Lamb, Williams held a slim 4-3 lead at intermission and then resorted to defensive tactics to carry that margin into the final period. Another Eph goal in the fourth stanza pushed the lead to 5-3 with only two minutes remaining, and Williams looked ready to avenge a 12-7 loss to Trinity in Florida.

However, a penalty put the Bantams a man up and Trinity star Dave Boone '87 converted his second goal to narrow the lead to 5-4. Then, after Williams threw the ball away with about 35 seconds remaining, Boone beat Lambert for the equalizer with only 13 ticks on the clock to send the game into sudden death.

A Lambert save created an Eph offensive opportunity, and Gilbert tallied his third goal of the day 1:59 into overtime to end the contest. Of the sophomore, Lamb said, "he always seems to rise to the occasion. He is a very smart player who knows how to get the goals."

Other Eph goal scorers were Chris Swindell '88, Jon Edie '88 and Jimmy Walker '88 on a day when Eph shooting (6 for 23) "was atrocious," according to Lamb. They forced Bantam keeper Matt Muller to make only seven saves. On the other hand, Eph keeper Lambert had 22 stops in what Lamb called "an unbelievable performance against the high-powered Trinity offense."

Wednesday's contest in Hanover against Dartmouth was much closer than the final 13-8 Green victory. The homestanders scored the final three goals in the final moments in what had been a tight affair. The flaw in the Ephs' performance against their Division I opponents was an inability to give the defense a rest by controlling the ball offensively. Williams scored their eight goals in only eight minutes of possession, giving the Green ample shots at the tired Eph defense. Lambert had 19 saves while senior goalie Dana Weeder was out with a knee injury and eight different Ephs scored in the loss.

Williams hits the road this week against Union tonight and at Wesleyan Saturday.

Mara Burnett '88 poured in five goals and Tenerowicz added two of her own. Burnett opened the second half scoring with her first tally on a quick shot between the goalie's legs. After an apparent Eph goal on a shot that hit the crossbar was not counted, Flaherty added her fourth goal of the game after a quick steal. Tenerowicz's two quick goals put the game out of reach and from then on it was the Mara Burnett show, as the junior attack scored the team's last four goals.

Smith never really had a chance to mount any kind of attack against Eph goaler Martha Hoopes '87, who recorded nine saves in the win. Tight defense and good team hustle kept the beleaguered Smith attack off balance all day. The win posts the team's record at 3-2, with earlier victories over Skidmore and Mount Holyoke and losses to Springfield and Tufts. The team takes to the road for the next three games, at Trinity Wednesday, and later at Wesleyan and Middlebury.

The home event will be a tuneup for the New England Championships this Sunday through Tuesday on Cape Cod. Coach Pohle is optimistic about the Ephs' chances in the 45-team tourney. Last year, Williams finished second among Division III schools behind Salem St.

"Right now, we have five guys who can play as well as anyone around," said Pohle. "We should finish in the top ten this year overall." Pohle's biggest worry at this point is the weather on Cape Cod. "Whenever you play on the Cape, you always have to worry about poor conditions."

IN SEARCH OF THE CONSTITUTION

Critically acclaimed weekly series on PBS.

In the bicentennial year of the United States Constitution, Bill Moyers takes the pulse of the nation's celebration in the weekly series, MOYERS: IN SEARCH OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Ten one-hour programs present one of America's most respected journalists with Supreme Court Justices, historians, educators, scholars, and citizens who have taken petitions of their constitutional rights all the way to the highest court in the land.

"The series is about ideas," Moyers says. "The people you will meet have spent their lives wrestling with interpretations of the Constitution. They remind us this document is alive in our times...requiring us to make up our minds about what happens if we ignore or misuse it."

General Motors is presenting this series of programs to broaden an appreciation of our Constitution in the belief that the strength of America lies in understanding our freedoms and responsibilities as citizens.

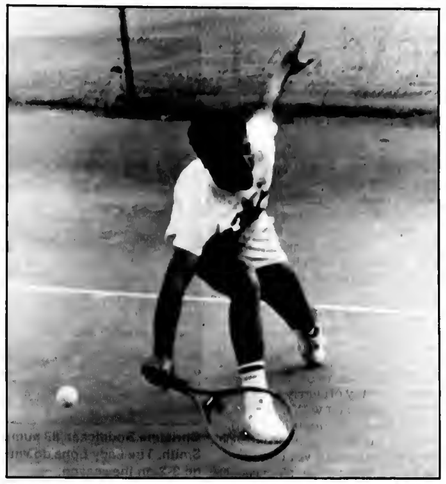
Men's tennis falls on road 5-4 vs. Jeffs



by Mary Kipp and Julie Jacobson

This past week, the men's varsity tennis team faced two of its toughest opponents. The Ephmen downed Colgate 6-3 at home on Wednesday before falling to Amherst in a taut road match Saturday by a 5-4 score.

Although Williams lost four of the six singles matches against the Lord Jeffs, all the losses went to three sets. Said freshman number six player Brad Hunt, "Amherst was really pumped up because it was their coach's last match against Williams." Bad weather also hurt the team as it was forced to play some of its matches indoors, givng the homestanding Jeffs the advantage.

Of the two singles victors, senior captain Kevin Callanan captured a three set triumph and frosh Marc Caltibiano registered a 6-4, 7-5 straight set victory.

As in the past, Williams strong point was its doubles. The number one team of Callanan and Drew Sawyer '89 defeated the top Amherst doubles squad and the dynamic number three duo of Pier Friend '88 and Hunt won in a third set tiebreaker. Unfortunately, the team could not duplicate its doubles sweep of Colgate as the number two pair of Hoyt Ludington '88 and Caltibiano fell, giving the Jeffs the match-clinching fifth win.

Number one singles player Kevin Callanan '87 stetches for a backhand in the neffers' 6-3 triumph over Division II Colgate. Callanan is 4-1 on the season in singles play. (Bank)

Div. II Colgate falls

In the contest against Division II Colgate, Williams took all three doubles matches after serving up a three-three split in singles play. Most impressive was the team of Caltibiano and Ludington, who obliterated their opponents by a 6-1,6-2 score.

In singles, Callanan experienced his first singles loss of the season while Ludington achieved his first singles win. Freshmen Caltibiano and Hunt once again proved their ability, as both beat their Rough Rider opponents in straight sets.

After the successful match against Colgate and the extremely close contest with Amherst (seven of the nine matches went to three sets) the Ephs go to Trinity today. This weekend, coach Sean Sloane's netters will return to the unfriendly confines of the Amherst courts where they will participate in the New England Small College Athletic Conference Championships. With an impressive 4-1 record, and having already defeated three of its four toughest opponents, the squad has an excellent chance of faring well. Indeed, a first place finish would not be an unexpected result.

by Al Mottur and Stewart Verdery

How many of you knew that the Taconic Golf Course was one of the top four college golf courses in the nation? And how many of you knew that Jack Nicklaus, when he was just sixteen years old, recorded a hole-in-one on Taconic's par 3 14th hole? These two facts alone should be plenty to induce you to try and "blister the course." But if they aren't enough, here are some more.

For one, its free, if you are willing to submit yourself to a few painless lessons. P.E. golfers can play all they want during weekdays for no cost. Moreover, golf is a great game. You've heard it all before -- 'Golf is a game you can play for the rest of your life.' Besides, after leaving Billsville, and entering the business market, be prepared to do about seventy percent of your deals on the links.

However, despite these obvious virtues, there are those who will tell you its not worth it. 'Don't waste your time out there,' they'll say. These fools don't understand the beauty of the sport. In a Record column three years ago, Dave Paulsen '87 claimed that "the golf course is no place for the average ethical Williams student." In giving out tips, he advocated cheating and said that starting up the game of golf was akin to opening yourself up to "a lifetime of frustration." Paulsen would probably even suggest the use of the noted club, the 'hand wedge.'

Those golf detractors such as Paulsen and Co. don't appreciate the true benefits the sport provides. So don't listen to them! Golf is going to be frustrating, everyone admits it. But people play despite that because the rewards are far greater. For those of you who are capable of playing reasonably good golf, maybe in the 85-95 range for 18, you have experienced the satisfaction of the great drive, sticking the approach shot, exploding a bunker shot. And even occasionally the ultimate satisfaction, the perfect hole — drive, iron, putt — BIRDIE!

For those of you who cannot remember the perfect hole, or for that matter, any good shot whatsoever, there is hope. Before leaving Williams, take a P.E. golf course and let pro Rick Pohle and staff cut strokes off your handicap. And even if you never come close to breaking 100, golf is still the best. Just head out to the course, grab some sun, hang out with some other 30-handicapers, and spend four hours walking around a beautiful place like Taconic.

So listen to us and try to get in a couple rounds this spring. It's only seven bean even if you're not in P.E. But if you see either of us lying five in a trap on number eight, don't remind us how great golf is, just watch out for flying sand wedges.

Ryan gains 3rd save in win

Blanck pitches Ephs past Albany St. 6-3

by Stewart Verdery

Last year, freshman Rob Blanck was a mystery man on the Eph pitching staff, throwing very hard but lacking control that could make him an effective pitcher. On the 1987 southern trip, the sophomore showed promise yet arrived north with an inflated earned run average. Last Tuesday, Blanck finally harnessed this potential, mowing down Albany State through seven innings to pick up the first victory of his Eph career, 6-3.

Albany could not mount any sustained threat against the Eph hurler, as Blanck allowed only three hits in his seven-plus innings of work. More importantly, he issued only five free passes to first while striking out four. He was aided by senior outfielder John Shaw's throwing out a runner at the plate in the second.

Meanwhile, Williams (3-1 up north, 4-8 overall) scratched for a run in the first. Jim Duquette '88 (hitting .588 up north, .367 overall) laid down a bunt in front of a deep third baseman. When the Albany pitcher heaved the ball into right field, 'Duquer' stood at second. His eighth stolen base of the year and junior Lew Collins' sacrifice fly plated the run.

Collins picked up his 10th RBI on a third-inning double and scored on a Chris Pachus '88 single to make the score 3-0. It went to 4-0 in the fifth on a Duquette triple and a Shaw single. The Ephs concluded their scoring with two more in the sixth.

In the top of the seventh, Blanck tired and stopper Bill Ryan '88 took over. A single scored a third Albany run, but a Collins-to Steve Belsito '87-to Rick Hedeman '87 double play, the Ephs' 15th of the year, ended the threat. In the seventh, Albany got men on first and third with no outs, but Ryan earned his third save by inducing two grounders and a whiff.

The Ephs doubleheader Saturday at Wesleyan was postponed until May 9th due to rain, meaning Williams will play the Cardinals three times in three days in their attempt to retake the Little Three title. This week, Williams traveled to Amherst today and heads to Maine for the weekend, playing Bowdoin Friday and Colby twice on Saturday.

Trackmen capture NESCAC meet

by Tom FitzGibbon

In a competition that came down to the final relay, the men's track team seized its first New England Small College Athletic Conference track championship. The women's team also recorded its highest finish ever by capturing fourth place. The key to the stellar team finishes was spectacular performances by top individuals supported by great team depth.

Distances in the field events were hampered by the wet weather, but the rain could not stop Brandt Johnson '87 from winning the high jump with a leap of 6'4". Henry Jones '88 kept the momentum going with second place finishes in both the long and triple jumps. Nat McCormick '88 speared third place with a fine toss of 167' in the javelin.

The intermittent rain did not hurt times on the track, however, as many Williams athletes recorded personal bests. Ted Arrowsmith '88 and Tom FitzGibbon '87 opened the scoring on the track in the 3000 meter steeplechase with second (9:37—qualifying for the NE Div. III Championships) and fifth place finishes respectively. Captain Jon Fisher '87 sliked his way to third place in the star-studded 1500 meters with a time of 3:57.9, a personal best that qualifies him for the NE Div. III as well. The 4X100 meter relay team of Pierre Swart '90, Scott Powers '88, Jon Horton '90 and Lars Hem '90 finished in third place, just ahead of archrival Amherst.

The next three events saw Williams in a dry spell until Andre Lopez '87 opened the floodgates for the Ephs' scoring with a victory in the 800 at 1:55.6. At this point, Williams was only a longshot trying to erase Bates' big early lead. The odds changed quickly, however, as Swart and Powers took second and fourth in the 200 to cut Bates' lead to 10 points. Dave Grossman '87 finished fourth in the 5000 meters to set the stage for the heroics of the 4X400 meter relay.

The finish was wet and wild as the relay team of Horton, Dave Nadelman '89, Fisher and Lopez held off the Hamilton and Amherst teams to win the final event at 3:24.8. When the Bates team finished out of the money in seventh place, the Williams' comeback, more exciting than a 3-pointer at the buzzer according to hoopster Johnson, was complete. When coach Richard Farley heard the final score of Williams 95, Bates 91.5, he said, "I don't believe it."

Macauley named MVP

The women's fourth place finish was led by meet MVP Dawn Macauley '89, who won the 100 meter hurdles (16.0), the 400 hurdles (64.3) and anchored the the 4X400 relay team to victory. Kate Pugh '87 started the day off early by finishing third in the 10,000 meter run with a personal best of 38:58.0. Sarah Hams '89 qualified for the Division I NE meet by taking fourth in the 5000 meter run, and the 1500 meters saw Williams rack up big points with a 3-4-5 finish by Jen Morris '89 (4:53), Becky Conklin '87 (4:54) and Sara St. Antoine (4:58).

Freshman Susan Gray continued her impressive first season by winning the 800 meter run at 2:21.9. Karlyn McNall '90 racked up points for Williams in both the triple jump and the hurdles.

The women's team title was not within reach this year but the very young 4X400 meter relay squad of Gray, Ann Dannhauer '90, Morris and Macauley left no doubt about this team's potential as it recorded a thrilling come-from-behind victory over Trinity in the final event.

The high finishes of both teams bodes well as they look toward victories next Saturday at the Little Three meet at Amherst.

The women's lacrosse team reduced its Smith counterparts to Smith-ereens on Saturday afternoon. Playing on its new field behind the tennis courts, the team posted a 13-3 rout of Smith College. Coach Chris Mason had high praise for her players after the game, saying, "the team looked sharp. They found each other on the passing game and the attack moved the ball inside very well."

The Ephs opened the game with a strong attack and kept the ball in Smith's end of the field for all but a few moments of the first half. Williams opened the scoring about five minutes into the game but Smith quickly tied the score. That tally marked the last time that Smith could stay with the high-flying Ephs, as Williams fired 32 shots at the bewildered Smith goalie.

Mo Flaherty '90 gave the Ephs a 2-1 lead with the first of her four goals of the day, with the assist coming on a nice pass by Lisa Tenerowicz '88 from behind the net. The first half was highlighted by an outstanding individual effort by Chris Boddicker '88. The speedy attacker intercepted a Smith outlet pass near midfield and drove through the entire Smith defense before beating the helpless goalie for the score. The Ephs held a 5-2 lead at the half.

The second half turned out to be a cakewalk, as high-scoring

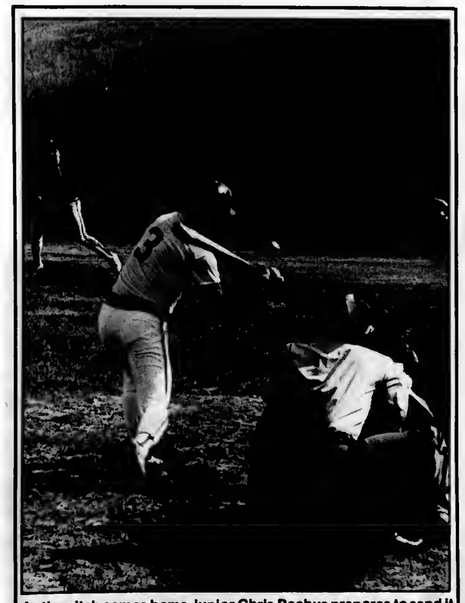
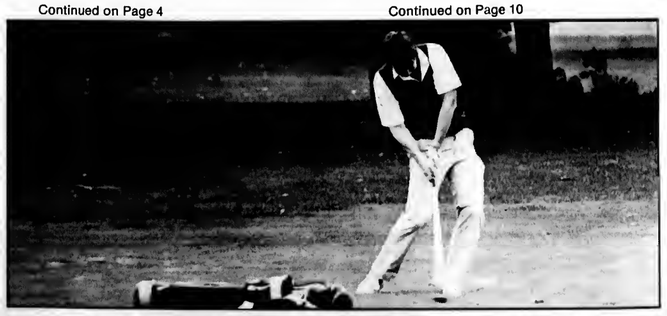
Ruggers rally to down Norwich



by Sean Brennan

It was a perfect spring day as the Maroon and Gold came home to the picturesque Purple Valley to battle it out on the pitch against Norwich University and Dartmouth College. In what was an awesome display of rugby, the WRFC fielded their feerless fifteen A-men against the strong and stapping Norwich squad. Later the B-siders fought off Norwich while the C's and D's fell to the Green from Dartmouth.



The A-side match started typically as Norwich scored first with a try and conversion to take a 6-0 lead. However, it wasn't long before Roger Merriam '87 put his foot into gear, making two consecutive penalty kicks to tie it at 6-6. Norwich scored one more try and ensuing conversion before the end of the half to go ahead 12-6 as the White Dogs were just beginning to wake up.

Rugby sage Paul Hogan '86 once said, "We must refuse to lose," and these words never rang truer as the second half

Harrington's 77 leads golf win at Taconic

by Ted Ruger

Showing a strong depth of talent, the varsity golf team opened its season impressively with 399-426 drubbing of Union College last Saturday. Mike Harrington '88 led all scorers with a score of 77 in the home match at the Taconic Golf Club.

The Ephs received help from fine shooting by other team members. Guy Kurtz '87, Tim Frechette '89, Ian Lapey '89, and Don Dagnoli '87 shot 78,79,81 and 84, respectively. These scores, combined with Harrington's, totaled a team score of 399.

Union's golfers were well behind at 426, a difference of over five strokes per player. The best Union score was an 81, shot by Pete Alexander.

Coach Rick Pohle was pleased with the victory, and cited the team's depth as a major strength. "I was especially happy with the variety of players who did well for us. With the kind of depth we have, we're sure to be in every match we play."

Harrington's low score is an example of such depth, according to Pohle. "Mike was our number five golfer going into the match. That he got the low score shows how well-balanced we are," Pohle said.

This week is a busy one for the Eph squad, with several key matches approaching. Today, the team takes on Trinity and A.I.C. in an away contest. Saturday, Williams will play host to the Eph classic, a twelve-team tournament for area schools.

College Council supports tutorials; disapproves of increased requirements

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The College Council passed resolutions supporting the tutorial proposal and defeating the distribution requirements proposal at its meeting last Thursday.

Also at the meeting College Council President Carter Zinn '88 tabled further discussion of a grievance committe for minority students, because such a committee is already being discussed by members of the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) with Dean of the College Stephen Fix.

The proposals considered by the council are sponsored by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) and will be voted on by the faculty tomorrow.

The tutorial proposal was approved by a vote of 28-0-1, and the distribution requirements proposal was defeated by a vote of 4-22-3. The council also supported the contract minor, 18-3-8

Discussing the formation of a grievance committee, an idea that was a major plank in Zinn's platform, Zinn said that the council would halt discussion until council officers meet with seven WBSU members after the WBSU and Fix finish their discussion about the committee.

"I'm going to take this committee seriously because it can do a lot of good for the college as a whole," Zinn said.

Zinn also discussed the letter sent to faculty concerning the composition of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP). He said he received 40 responses to the letter within 36 hours.

"I don't think there's any doubt in the minds of the faculty about the serious intent of the College Council," Zinn said. "Some of the professors who reacted most harshly (to the letter) also had some of the College plans events to cope with problem of date-rape on campus

by Karen Costenbader

"Most rapes are committed by seemingly nice guys, the kind that sit next to you in class, and that the woman might know very well," philosophy professor Rosemarie Tong said at a Rape Awareness Panel held in March. Her talk concerned date-rape, which she said resulted many times from miscommunication, sexual stereotypes, and differences in expectations.

Although the Williamstown Police described the rape of a Williams freshman last January as a violent attack, Assistant Dean Sheila Spear said that many rapes — date-rapes — are being committed on this campus all the time.

"I see it (the January rape) very much in the context all the way from dating to actual physical violence. By no means do I see the rape as some sort of totally separate incident," said Spear, who helped organize the Rape Awareness Panel.

NASC student senate votes to oust editor; He refuses to abide by decision

Reacting to an April Fool's edition of the North Adams State College (NASC) newspaper that contained material considered offensive by some of its readers, the college's student senate voted 24-4 last Tuesday to oust the Beacon's editor, the Berkshire Eagle reported.

The editor, Thomas Auclair, said he would not accept the senate's decision because it does not have jurisdiction over the paper, the Eagle said.

"I'm not here to ask the Student Government Association to vote against impeaching me," Auclair said at the beginning of the meeting, "because your whole action is illegal.

"I won't abide by any decision passed by this body."

The meeting began with a half-hour of public debate, followed by a closed discussion and a secret vote, the Eagle said.

The edition in question is an eight-page parody entitled 'The Bacon.' Among other articles, it contained a picture of NASC President Catherine A. Tisinger's head on top of another woman's body, with the heading "Kathy's Phone Sex" and her office phone number underneath.

The Eagle quoted senate member Lisa Kenney as saying the issue was "in bad taste, obscene and a strike against our school. It's been in the papers, and people in town are reading about it. Our reputation is heading down."

Before the meeting and vote, Auclair consulted the Student Press Law Center in Washington, D.C. about the actions being considered by the senate, the Eagle said. He distributed a response sent to him by Mark Goodman, executive director of the center.

"Your school administration and its student government should be advised that by their actions they run a significant risk of subjecting themselves to a First Amendment infringement lawsuit," Goodman's letter was quoted as saying.

College loses electricity as house is moved

Harsch buys Walden house on Spring Street for $1

by Susanne Abell

The Walden house, formerly located at 83 Spring Street, was moved last Wednesday to the Paul Harsch Real Estate Agency on Route 2. The house was sold by Chester Soling to Paul Harsch for $1.

Harsch also paid for moving the house. Harsch said that Soling had bought the house and land about one year ago through the Paul Harsch Real Estate Agency. When Soling decided that he had no use for the house itself, Harsch volunteered to take it rather than to let it be torn down. Harsch said that he found the house attractive because it is a historic building (1846), it is handsome and it has a lot of square footage.

The height of the house required that the approximately 50 power lines between Spring Street and the Route 2 location be temporarily lowerd, cutting off elctricity to the college, businesses and residents along the route. Harsch said that 50 to 60 people, from the police, the telephone company and Massachusetts Electric were involved in the move.

College buildings were without electricity from 7:20 a.m. to Record marks 100 years

Memorable moments from the past

History of Williams through students' eyes

With this issue, the Record marks 100 years of publication.

But as with many 100-year-olds, determining the actual birthday is a bit complicated.

A newspaper published by students of Williams College first appeared on April 23, 1887, but under a different name — The Williams Weekly.

If the founders had had their way, this would be Volume 100, Number One, of the Weekly but since 1887, the period of each volume has been changed from April-March to September-May, where it will remain for at least the near future.

More importantly, in 1904 the paper decided to publish twice a week, which necessitated a name change. "The Williams Record" was adopted, though little else in the paper changed.

The old Weekly had not been the first newspaper published at Williams College. Before it came the The Adelphian, of 1831, the Quarterly, the Review, the Athenaeum, the Argo, the Fortnight and the Williams Vidette, the Weekly's predecessor, which was published from 1867 to 1887. It was the Vidette's closing in 1887 that gave impetus for the foundation of a new college paper. In the Vidette's last editorial, it gave advice for its successor:

"We know that, out of our parting, somewhere, somehow a new and perhaps a better paper will appear. To those who will stand behind it, we leave these words: be fair, be true, be fearless, and fight for that which will make your paper a part of Williams."

Just Another Newspaper

The first issue of the Williams Weekly, now celebrating its 100th anniversary as the the Williams Record, appeared three months after those words, on April 23, 1887. One thousand copies of the paper, at 10¢ a copy, were printed under the editorship of E.J. Thomas '88 (1888).

"We mean to steer it between the Scylla of the short story and the Charybdis of state news," the first editorial announced. "In short, our design is to publish the news of the college promptly at the end of each week and with it the fullest posible information concerning alumni."

The eight-page issue, which carried no bylines, led off with a story on the baseball team's loss to to the national club in Washington, 21-6. It also had a poetry section, "Cobwebs," and "Intercollegiate Notes," most of which was devoted to attacking Amherst.

The Record in its early years was sports. Often, nothing but sports; editorials, stories and photos focused on team activities and players. Until the 1920's, tales of the teams, all their games, all their managers, and, in some instances, every play of the game were central to the paper.

The Weekly of the 1880's and 1890's favored the baseball team, and chronicled the nine's seasons every week in front-page stories and editorials. The 1891 team's Southern Trip, which went as far south as Philadelphia, gained four full pages of Weekly coverage and, regrettably, a 2-8-1 record.

Oakley and a survivor speak at remembrance service on Holocaust

Lewis Reznik, a Holocaust survivor, spoke at a service last Friday night in remembrance of the Holocaust in the Kuskin Center. He recounted his experience hiding in the woods in Eastern Europe to escape the Nazis.

Also speaking at the service was College President Francis Oakley, who discussed man's inhumanity to man and the lessons that can be learned from the Holocaust.

Other events in the Holocaust remembrance during the past week included Bronfman series lecturer Elizabeth Wilen-Berg's talk Wednesday on "Teaching Our Children About the Holocaust," and a talk Sunday by Rabbi Alan Berg, associate college chaplain, on post-Holocaust theology. Additionally, Claude Lanzmann's acclaimed documentary "Shoah" will be shown in four segments, from Monday through Thursday, at 8 p.m.

Tailgates and participation

At a special town meeting last November, Williamstown voters adopted a measure that prohibits open alcohol containers in public areas. If enforced assiduously, the new law will banish a venerable college tradition from Williamstown: the tailgate party.

Tailgates are by no means unique to Williams. At schools across the nation, such parties are common at all types of sporting events, particularly football games. Students, parents and alumni enjoy the atmosphere of pre- and post-game revelry. Such revelry, moreover, has for many people often involved the consumption of alcoholic beverages.

Williamstown's new ordinance, however, could change all that. No longer will beer, liquor or wine be permitted at tailgates. Chief of Police Joseph Zolto Jr. has suggested soda, but somehow the replacement seems less than satisfactory.

Nevertheless, the law stands, having narrowly escaped defeat by a vote of 29-19. The numbers involved in that vote raise an issue that both includes and surpasses the particularly painful tailgate problem. The issue is that of student involvement in local politics.

Christopher Johanson's letter on this page points out the narrow margin of approval in the creation of the open container law. The law was passed not by elected or appointed representatives, but rather by ordinary voters. Operating as it does on the direct democracy principles of the New England town meeting, Williamstown government is to a great extent in the hands of the voters. Anyone registered to vote in Williamstown may attend and vote at all town meetings.

Very few students choose to exercise the rights inherent in the town meeting system, yet the issues addressed at these meetings are often of direct relevance to the college. In the case of the open container law, the active participation of even a modest number of students might have thwarted the approval of the law.

Of course, not many students are registered to vote in Williamstown. But more should be. Barring any compelling reasons to remain voters in their home town, the advantages of local registration are considerable. More students should avail themselves of the opportunity to participate directly in the political environment that surrounds them.

And as for the immediate future, the possibility of repealing the open container law is attractive and intriguing, for students and native townspeople. Perhaps students can help Williamstown rid itself of this obtrusive law.

Censorship at NASC

The vote last week by the student senate at North Adams State College (NASC) to remove the editor of the campus paper, the Beacon, is distressing. Censorship is rearing its ugly head five miles east of here, and it's happening on a campus with a traditionally strong newspaper.

The NASC senate maintained it had the authority to remove the editor, senior Thomas Auclair, after the Beacon published an April Fools' issue, which the senate called offensive and obscene.

Auclair said that the paper simply won't accept the decision, and that he may respond with a lawsuit.

The spoof issue may have offended a majority of students, but censorship is not the answer. It will do no short-term good for the campus, and it may do much long-term harm. The student senate said that the parody was "damaging to the reputations of individuals and this institution." But having a student government exercise direct control over a student newspaper could do a lot more damage to the institution's reputation.

The senate should rethink its vote. Meanwhile, the staff of the Beacon has a hard struggle ahead.

'Unfortunate'

To the editor:

RE: Record article, "Greylock Quad is first choice for freshmen"(14 April) and letters of Seth Rabinowitz and Frank Vespe (21 April)

It is unfortunate that both the Record reporter and the writers of the two letters attribute to me comments made by students. The Record reporter apparently mistook my reference to remarks I had heard from students as my own sentiments.

Sincerely,

Mary Kenyatta
Assistant Dean of the College

The editors reply: The Record remains convinced that Dean Kenyatta was quoted accurately and fairly.

'Arrogant'

To the Editor:

On April 19, WCFM broadcast an episode of Community Affairs. I called in to offer a question to one of the guests on the show, Martin White. My question was misquoted to him, on the air, in such a distorted fashion that it did not convey its point, and as well affirmed views I wished to deny. I immediately walked to the basement of Baxter Hall where I was told that the alteration of my statement was a mistake. The individual who made the mistake then instructed Martin to inform WCFM's listeners that I had been misquoted. Martin White ignored the instruction.

My original statement was that not everyone who disagrees with Martin disagrees with him because he is black. Many people simply disagree with him. Personally, I like Martin as an individual, but disagree with him as a spokesperson for any organization. I disapprove of his methods as a political actor. His tactics are inflammatory, arrogant, and simply distasteful. His unwillingness to retract a misquote that was slanderous to a critic only evidences his disinterest in responsible political behavior.

New Yorkers

To the Editor:

I, and probably every other New Yorker on campus took great offense at last week's Trivia Quiz. In an effort to resurrect interest in your competition you used a certain theme which was, at the same time, stupid and insulting.

Everyone in America, if not in the free world, knows that the Mets won the 1986 World Series. Your reference to Ron Darling as a "pretty-boy pitcher" totally disregards his true skill as one of the top three pitchers in the National League.

While I find the above-mentioned barbs moronic, your question regarding the 1985 Cy Young Award winner who is now in drug rehab both lacks compassion and fails to comprehend the true nature of the problems of substance abuse. I doubt that there is a soul in this country who does not know that Dwight Gooden is the answer to your twisted question. His disease, which you treated in such a flippant manner, is reflective of a societal problem that you addressed in the April 14 issue. To treat such a problem lightly is rude to your sponsors and unfair to the readers of the Williams Record.

CUSS

To the Editor:

The College Undergraduate Suffrage Society (CUSS) was more than a little upset to read that Chief Zolto, failing to see the connection between football and beer, plans to use the open container law to end tailgating on Williams College property. Let us point out a few important points to consider.

First, the open container law was passed at a special town meeting on November 25, 1986. It was passed by a vote of 29-19.

Secondly, all voters registered in Williamstown can go to the regular town meeting and any special town meetings and may vote.

Next, the population of Williamstown is 8,135. This includes 1,981 Williams College students. In 1985 there were 4,195 registered voters.

Finally, Williams College students may register to vote in Williamstown.

We feel that the conclusion is obvious. Previously, Williamstown politics have had a negligible impact on Williams College students. The events of this year have shown otherwise. CUSS encourages both students and non-students to take a more active role in Williamstown politics. The first step is to register to vote in Williamstown. In the coming weeks we will explain the procedures of voter registration in Williamstown.

'Ridiculous'

To the Editor:

Perhaps it would be wise for Dean Kenyatta to spend less time worrying about the "dominant ethos" of the various residential houses on campus and more time thinking before she speaks to reporters. She should remember that, as dean, she speaks for the college.

It would seem as though now would be the time to try to improve relations between the students and the college administration. Instead, we have a dean who makes ridiculous statements that alienate large segments of the student body.

College leftists turn blind eye to Russian record of atrocities

by David Rakonitz '88

Why is it that some people at Williams bemoan the atrocities of the South African government or of the Pinochet regime but are silent about the repression in Afghanistan and Kampuchea? Even though it currently fashionable to laud Gorbachev's new policy of openness; the Soviet bloc remains a closed society. To be sure, this system is currently less restrictive than before, but dissidents still get harassed by KGB-sponsored thugs. Many politically aware and active people at Williams seem not to care or give minimal priority to these events, which are not causes celebres for the Left.

The New York Times reported last November that between six to eight thousand Afghan refugees arrive daily into Pakistan. This number is not surprising since Afghans are the world's largest group of refugees.

What is surprising is the minimal attention given to the Afghan plight on the Williams campus. Why isn't there a movement to purge the Williams College stock portfolio of all companies which do business with the Soviet Union? After all, those dollars bolster the Russian economy and thus allow their military to continue its oppressive occupation of Afghanistan. In order for politically active people to ignore this situation, I can think of two broad categories of excuses: objective and ideological.

According to the objective perspective, United States citizens should be primarily concerned about their country's actions. Nations not significantly tied to the United States do not deserve a great deal of attention. This rationalization ignores the following fact: the United States is part of an interconnected world. American trade with Afghanistan may be minimal, but the problem is not Afghanistan. The problem is the Soviets in Afghanistan, and the United States has every reason to be concerned about the Soviet Union's invasion of a neighboring state. Prior to the invasion, neither the Afghan government nor any likely successor was going to invite American military advisors into their government or enter into an alliance with the U.S. Afghanistan was simply moving into a more neutralist position.

The actions of the Soviet Union should concern every American; there is no excuse, other than apathy or being a Russian apologist, for ignoring such Soviet atrocities as dropping small, exploding toys over Afghan villages.

Another non-ideological excuse would be to blame the press. By focusing on certain issues, newspapers and television networks raise the public awareness on selected topics. Accoprding to this line of thought, only these issues should be pressed since the public is somewhat cognizant of them. The press is an important American institution but that does not make its judgement perfect. If the press ignores or underplays an issue, intelligent and aware people can work to keep the issue in the forefront. As part of America's intellectual elite, Williams College students are perfectly capable of pushing their own agenda on the campus, if not nationally. The two major positions of supposedly objective, non-ideological reasoning break down so it is now time to examine the ideological position.

Ranging from support of the Soviet invasion to placing a simply higher priority on other international hotspots, the ideological perspectives cannot be addressed in the same way as the objective approach. When facing a priority system, logic seldom overcomes belief. How does one prove that one atrocity or immoral situation merits the same attention as another to a person who is, for whatever reasons, concerned primarily with only the latter problem?

Even though it would be kind of fun and fairly accurate to argue that this campus's silence on Afghanistan is due to soft-headed Liberals dominating the College's political voice, such diatribes by themselves are not terribly productive. The far left of American politics is always ready to condemn the United States, its allies, or right-wing governments but hypocritically turns a blind eye to abuses committed by the Soviets, its cohorts and leftist regimes.

The solution is not to silence these individuals, however wrong-headed they might be, but for other voices to speak out. Moderates and Conservatives should be more active in pushing their concerns on this campus and thus create a more balanced political atmosphere.

Williams must restructure its housing to guarantee equity

The Williams College housing system is in desperate need of revamping. Facets of the system are unfair and the system is susceptible to abuse by house presidents and scheming students.

My proposal to change the housing system will make it more equitable and less subject to self-serving individuals who would kill to insure a good room for themselves and their friends.

Another Word
by Andrew Mayer

- Freshman inclusion should be left as it is. There is not a fairer way to randomly assign students to housing affiliates than first choice maximization.

We have to realize that when randomly assigning numbers to choose housing affiliates, there will be winners and losers. Everyone is not going to be happy. Someone is bound to be upset.

- The upperclass housing transfer system, on the other hand, is not random, able to be abused by individual house presidents and does not favor students living in their last choice affiliate as strongly as it should.

The first step will be to take the transfer system out of the hands of the Housing Committee and the house presidents. Let's make it as random as the freshmen affiliation system. In the present system, house presidents can influence choices by unfairly deciding how many males and females their house can accept.

Since the housing office knows how many of each sex are returning to each house the next year and sex quotas are already established for each house before freshman inclusion, the housing office should decide how many males and females will be transferred to each house.

Students wanting to transfer should be ranked just as they are in the present transfer system, according to the number choice they received freshman year and then randomly within each subset.

With each student/group now possessing a number, the transfer system should be first choice maximization with one exception. All rising seniors in their fifth choice affiliate should be transferred first and so on down the line.

This type of housing transfer system is fairer, because it is random. House presidents will not be able to influence the system and attempt to keep students out of their house. When I hear that two rising seniors living in their fifth choice got returned to that house through the transfer system, I know something is wrong.

- The co-op system needs a simple revamping. The system was changed this year and instead of assigning each group a random number, each individual received a number. The hope was all students would then be equal when the draw was done.

In reality, the larger groups got a great advantage by having seven or so people receive numbers while smaller groups had less of a chance to get a high pick. Let's go back to the old system and give each group a number instead of individuals. Otherwise, large groups will continue to possess an unfair advantage over small groups.

- Even if this entire proposal is implemented, people are still going to be unhappy, and will want to trade picks to get into another house. While I can't offer a foolproof solution to this problem, I do have a suggestion.

Once each spring, after freshmen inclusion and transfers are over and before room draw , a time and place should be set aside when all students wanting to make a trade could gather in one room. It would be similar to a ski swap.

Students wouldn't have to rely on word of mouth or advertising, but could show up at this meeting to trade their picks. House presidents could be present at the meeting to immediately finalize trades.

- As for room draw itself, I only have one suggestion: have a non-affiliate direct room draw. Perhaps another house president or the faculty advisor could do the job. This would simply insure that no one in the house is playing with the numbers in room draw.

If enacted, this proposal demands the cooperation of the housing office, the Housing Committee, and house presidents. It isn't a cure-all, but only attempts to do what the present system cannot accomplish: to make people happy.

The imperial passage to India: "remembrance" of things past

by Jenny Attiyeh '87

Her first clear picture of India was a tall, handsome man from the countryside who wore homespuns, he said, in respect for Gandhi, and who handed her a cup of tea. She was at a Gandhi conference in New Delhi, and later learned that it is the Indian habit to place several cubes of sugar into tea.

She is quite the Edwardian lady, the innocent of literature who has come to peek at India. She is somewhat brave to leave her comfortable home to see so many different people. But in India she may indulge in a foreign ether which intoxicates her. This rapture replaces the dreariness of the overtrod blocks at home. I am afraid she cannot pretend to be Indian, to paint this country as it deserves; she can only observe what visitors have the courage to seek.

The India of a month tour is only in bits, and serves more to understand the Western than the Indian. What she brought from India was no new consciousness of how the world ought to be, but sights, smells, sounds, sensations of excitement that were not much different from those produced by a loose run on a horse one cannot quite control.

Her sketchbook was never idle, and she debated with herself only rarely if her paintbrush would be interfering with the privacy of a family she longed to capture. Her hesitation was momentary. The colors of all those walls were the perfect faded terra cottas many of the London galleries had applied much effort to attaining.

Of course, she was in search of the Real India just like Adela Quested, that silly woman of E. M. Forster's imagination. She did not think she had found it until she escaped the modernized New Delhi, and stood in the crowded market streets of Brindaven. There, she thought she had found it. There, in front of a tem-acid, 2,4-D, in the Scotts Pro-Turf Fertilizer laid down each May, Quinn explained that the product was spread in granular form. If it were sprayed, it would cause a health hazard, he said.

According to Quinn, the granules of the fertilizer lie near the roots of the grass and only decompose when they are exposed to rainwater. Thus, Quinn said, no harm is possible because the application is on the bottom, not the top of the grass.

A study released late last year by the National Cancer Institute said that excessive exposure to 2,4-D may result in a higher risk of lymphatic cancer.

The New York Times reported last August 30 that 2,4-D was used in the defoliant Agent Orange, which caused physical damage to people when it was used in the Vietnam war.

A later article in the Times reported that 2,4-D appears in over 1500 weed-killing products sold over-the-counter. The reason for its widespread use, according to the Times, is its effectiveness in killing a wide range of weeds and its relative inexpensiveness.

According to a U.S. Labor Department Material Safety Data Sheet, 2,4—D constitutes 1.22 percent of the fertilizer.

The use of herbicides on campus was revived five years ago, after a 10-15 year moratorium. Dethier said the school felt that the campus was not looking as aesthetically pleasing as it could, and restored the use of fertilizer and herbicides.

"I'm a little surprised that it is still allowed to be applied," said Dethier.

According to Dethier, several parents of children that attend the day care center near the church on campus, contacted him to express concern over the danger to their children, who often play on the lawn west of Hopkins Hall during the summer.

The parents became concerned after reading signs placed at various areas throughout the campus about the herbicide spreadings, Dethier said. The signs were used for the first time last year at heavily-used lawns like those near the Science Quad and the Berkshire Quad. Quinn explained that the signs will continue to be used to warn those playing or walking on the grass.

When asked how his committee will deal with the herbicide spreadings and possible dangers, Dethier replied it is being considered.

The committee plans to meet with Quinn later this week to discuss the options open to them. Dethier said the group aims to make a recommendation to College President Francis Oakley. Of primary importance, said Dethier, is getting a sense of what type of posting will be done on campus,and where.

On his first impressions of the usage of 2,4-D on the college campus, Dethier replied "I don't understand why we're using herbicides at all."

three points versus UVM's 34.

B-side gets revenge

The lamentable loss by the A's did do something positive by stirring the B-side to hit the pitch with desire in their hearts and revenge on their minds. After UVM scored first with a penalty kick to go ahead 3-0, a horde of hungry Williams ruggers began their triumphant trouncing of the visitors as Jim Franz '87 drove a try in to make it 4-3.

From that point on, the scrumming B-side never let up, With Williams up 24-3, the killer B's were relentless and went full steam ahead as Erik Valdes '87 stormed in for a try after a superbly strategic kick from Pavios Yeroulanos '88. With Hollenberg's conversion, the B-side had redeemed the WRFC with a sweet 30-3 victory.

and Jonny Hollenberg '88 was next into the try zone, scoring off a superior scrum effort to put Williams ahead 14-3 after the conversion. More excitement followed as the Maroon and Gold kept rolling, and Andy Anselmi '87 scored on a line run to make it 20-3 with Hollenberg's conversion.

It was the scrum's turn again soon, and it was hooker Chas Benedict '89 who got the call and, being the 'porter' he is, carried in the ball and some UVM ruggers to put down a try.

The annual Black and White Parents' Weekend Classic followed, and with strong play from the ranks of the C-sides and the help of the fervent festivities that followed, the day ended on a happier note, with the twinkle of Amherst in every White Dog's eye.

Short rehearsal time hurts 'Heartbreak'

The Williamstheatre production of Shaw's "Heartbreak House" will be repeated this Thursday, Friday and Saturday at 8 p.m. on the MainStage of the Adams Memorial Theatre. (Somers)

by Chuck Goforth

In Europe, before World War I, there was a class of people who lived all week long the way Yuppies can do only on the weekends; their sustenance was art, conversation, the countryside and refined pleasures of all sorts. But had Robin Leach graced that era as he does ours, he'd never have visited one of these people's homes. They had no fur-lined jacuzzi's or outrageously luxurious beachfront condos. They had money to entertain, but it came to them much as it comes to us college types: parents, a few scattered jobs, maybe a grant and greeting cards from grandma. They weren't poor, but neither were they rich.

George Bernard Shaw's name for this cultured, leisured and crumbling family is "Heartbreak House," and that is also the title of his play about these people, their battles and fears. Last week, Williamstheatre opened its own production of "Heartbreak," and if you haven't seen it yet, you should. The run ends this weekend.

Demanding script

Director Micheal Knight has taken on yet another large, long and demanding script — in the tradition of "The Bacchae," "The Critic," and "The Blacks."— and he had very little time to meet the challenge. Though "Heartbreak" has some predictable weaknesses, a few solid scenes, a very talented cast, and the spectacle of the set and costumes all make this show worth seeing — if not quite three hours of it.

Walking and talking in a large, old house, and a lavish moonlit garden, the characters of "Heartbreak" aren't what you'd call active. The play is one of words. The emotions and ideas are all expressed in monologues and dialogues, while the characters remain fairly still, lounging in the thick air of the drawing room.

Revolving door

A semi-eccentric old man named Captain Shotover is the head of the household at which this entire play takes place. The plot is structured around a large assortment of visitors and family at the house, who are constantly making use of what must be a revolving door in the back. Captain Shotover keeps a very open house, admitting strangers as well as friends, all of whom spin their wheels, revealing each other and themselves, playing games with each other and then being honest, depending on the mood.

The character work in the Williams production goes from passable to excellent. Laura Richman'89 is Ellie, the youngest visitor to this house, and she plays it very well. The scene between her and Captain Shotover, played by David Eppel, is probably the finest in the show. It is rich with feeling and wholly realistic. Richman and Eppel not only have created very real and infectious characters, they have created a dynamic and interesting relationship between the two, one that makes their moments together compelling and often moving.

All the relationships in this show have the potential to be this way, but unfortunately, in most cases, they have not been developed well enough. That hurts "Heartbreak" a lot. It's a play that, because of the emphasis on dialogue, demands that the tensions and histories between characters be in high relief, and that the actors all be very sure how they're going to talk to one character as opposed to another. The dangerously short rehearsal time is probably the culprit here. Even professionals would find it difficult to prepare for three hours of Shaw in two and a half weeks. The result is empty moments and confusing emotions.

But Richman and Eppel aren't the only saving grace. Another notable performance is given by Blake Robison'88 as Ellie's somewhat wandering father who needs only his few skills and his love for Ellie to keep him going. Robison's portrayal of the likeable old man is clean, understated and effective. Mark Solan '88 as wimpy and whining Randall is very funny and a real plus for this show. Ben Voorhies'88 and Stephanie Bond'88 do their usual solid work. Kristin Sziarto'88 plays a convincing if somewhat subdued Lady Utterword. Christopher Shorb'88 is the dashing Hector, and though the handsome mustache is in place, it appears he relied a little to heavily on simply being dashing.

Bravo

The other aspects of this production are excellent and help to make up for the weak moments.

A real note of credit should go to the lighting design of Lenore Doxsee '87. Inside information has it that she used almost every light in the theater; the many lights have been put together so that they just fashion the mood and support the play without ever making themselves apparent. There is a gradual setting of the sun that finishes act one with a shower of reds and yellows; it all happens just right, until before you know it the light coming through the windows of the big house is the deep, luxurious blue of evening. Bravo.

Arden Fingerhut and Deborah Brothers, as set and costume designers, have skills that go unquestioned by this critic. Watch for Fingerhut's climbing vines and big bay windows, the sense of clutter that is just right while giving the actors all the room in the world, and then the conversion of the living room into a garden that makes you worried about birds overhead.

Brother's costumes tell of the character's needs and habits as lonely people, helping to betray the emptiness and longing that is hidden behind the lush, lush ceremonies.

Although this production might have been a little too large of a challenge for Williamstheatre, considering the amount of time and the limits of the director and cast, it is a challenge faced head-on by everyone involved in the production.

The technical work is highly professional and wonderful to see. This show has moments that will have your eyes wandering around the theater, but it has just as many moments that will make you sit up and listen, laugh, and applaud.

Better than selling pecans...

Smith club holds book sale

by Anne O'Malley

The Smith College Club of Berkshire County will hold its annual book sale this Thursday and Friday at the Congregational Church. The sale raises scholarship money for Berkshire County students to attend Smith. Sale hours will be 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. Thursday and 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Friday.

"It's a way to raise money instead of selling pecans, which is not very interesting," noted Lillian Bostert, wife of Williams history professor Russell Bostert. "We feel that it is a service to the students as well as to the community," she said, "We find homes for the books that some people might not want anymore."

The Smith Club has been sponsoring a book sale for 26 years. The club has raised over $80,000 for scholarships through the sale, according to Bostert, who has been involved with the sale for all 26 years. She noted that many Williams faculty spouses have worked on the book sale through the years, and that Susan Smith, wife of Admissions Director Philip Smith, is in charge of this year's sale.

50¢ category

Bostert estimated that this year's sale will include 10,000 books, all of which were donated to the club and collected by volunteers. She said that there are all kinds of books, as well as magazines and some art work, and that the prices are very low: "Probably most are in the 50¢ category." There are about 50 categories of books, including Americana, sports and travel. "Many are the kind you can't buy in a bookstore," Bostert commented.

Book collecting

"Williams book collectors have used the sale for many years to find treasures and get just ordinary reading," said Bostert. Until 10 years ago, there was an annual prize awarded at commencement for the best student book collection; according to Bostert, it used to be a hobby to try to get the best collection. "I used to have students just begging me to look for certain sets of books." Bostert attributed the decline in book collecting to the fact that people move more often than they used to and they don't have as much space to store books anymore.

The Smith sale is a very well-known book sale, according to Bostert. She said that there would be people waiting at the door for hours before the sale starts on Thursday morning, and that many of them come from more than 100 miles away.

Competition and cheating

"The sale is a bustle of activity on Thursday morning, with students, townspeople and professional book dealers competing for a first chance at the treasures," said Bostert. "If, however, one can't get to the sale Thursday morning, the rest of the time is much more relaxing and there are still thousands of good books to choose."

Bostert estimated that the sale attracts a couple thousand people every year. She said that people started lining up at 6 a.m. a few years ago, and that some of the book dealers became upset because others tried to peek in the windows. "We used to have people watching to make sure no one cheated," she said.

Dickering

It's hard to sell everything since the sale lasts for less than two days, Bostert said. "That's one reason we give such good buys — we have to try to get rid of everything if we can," she observed. "There is a possibility of dickering a little bit after the first morning," she said, adding that there are also markdowns beginning at noon on Friday. Any leftover books are given to hospitals or charity groups.

On October 23, 1892, the Weekly reported the formation of a Prohibition Club to "advance by all honorable means the principles of Prohibition and to cooperate in the work of the National Prohibition Society."

The Weekly gained influence and avoided failure in its first decade. Some of the influence was profound, as witnessed by the editorial of February 3, 1898. "The Weekly is glad to note that its suggestion in regards to forming a basketball club has been acted upon," it went, adding "if the men develop sufficent ability in the game, it is likely that a college team will be selected to play Amherst."

Biweekly, at last

The Weekly, however, simply could not remain weekly. In 1903 the Williams Record appeared, along with an announcement that the Student newspaper of Williams College would now be published bi-weekly, a schedule it kept, interrupted only by world wars, until 1978.

In 1907 Williams marked a national championship in basketball, or so the Record claimed. While no title yet existed, the claim is perhaps justified by the team's 76-6 victory over Yale University that March.

The new century marked building, both real and planned. The Gargoyle Gate to Weston Field was erected in 1904, with a design whose "object is to separate people on foot from the carriages and so avoid confusion." Williams, Currier and Chapin Halls were built in the first decade as well, though Chapin Hall was first called Grace Hall in honor of Mrs. Grace Chapin, the wife of the benefactor.

A new gym was considered in 1916, with a proposal for a giant triangular complex that would hold two basketball courts, seven squash courts, and a baseball diamond inside, and two outdoor tennis courts. World War I brought planning to a temporary halt, but only 68 years passed until construction began on a new facility.

Despite its sports-centric world, the Record found time to cover some other events. In October of 1912 President William Howard Taft visited Williams — for a total of 25 minutes. That year's main news item was the trustees' decision that Williams teams could not play further than 200 miles from campus. Before that decision, many games were played as far away as Chicago. In 1913 still another sport made its appearance at Williams with the playing of the college's first soccer game.

World War I came to Williams in the summer of 1917, and many students left to enlist. Even before war was declared Williams men enlisted overseas, serving in organizations such as the American Field Service Ambulance Corps, the French Foreign Legion and the elite Lafayette Escadrille aviators. By the spring of 1918, all students inducted into Gargoyle were off-campus in military service.

The Record suspended publication in 1918, and the resumption of the paper in Winter Carnival also appeared in the 1920's, with the first Winter Carnival, modeled on Dartmouth's, appearing in January 1926 and "attracting 150 girls," according to the Record's account.

tion. Students, and everyone else, freely violated the law, leading professor Ebenezer Fitch to warn students in 1921 that "By breaking the law yourselves you, the privileged classes, are playing into the hands of the Bolsheviks."

January 1919 explained "There wasn't any Record because there wasn't any College ... Like everything that was non-essential it was discarded." The military's Camp and Campus replaced the Record for the fall of 1918.

Prohibition, the first time

As the war ended and students returned, the roaring twenties arrived at Williams, but with them came Prohibition.

In the decade between 1925 and 1935, the Record acquired a more serious tone and pursued the news more vigorously than it had in the previous decade. For the first time, bylines appeared above many articles, though not all. Sports stories appeared less frequently on the front page. The changes seemed in part to be a reaction to change in the nation.

A sketch of Thurber

The Record of the late 1930's established a brand of adversarial journalism by sending reporters to harrass and interview prominent figures in Boston and New York. Those interviewed in 1938 and 1939 included members of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade who had returned from fighting for the Republic in the Spanish Civil War, John Lewis, head of the United Mine Workers, and James Thurber, found at the Algonquin Hotel, who provided the Record with a sketch on the condition that the reporter leave him alone.

Others did not react so well. "If you print anything, I'll give you a kick in the pants," warned Newton Carleton, president of Western Union, while Ernst von Roth, Nazi German Consul in Washington, told a reporter "democracy is nice, if you can afford it."

World War II came to Williamstown in 1940, with the beginning of the draft. The Record urged the United States to keep its isolationism, and launched a front-page attack on professor of political science Frederick Schuman for prophecying in class "The end of western civilization" if the French lost to the Nazis in 1940, as they quickly proceeded to do.

The war's effect upon the United States and the Nazis' drive across Europe finally led the Record to call for American intervention in April of 1941. The editorial was written by Frederick Rudolph '42, who would later become College Marshal and professor of history at Williams. "The U.S. needs a declaration of war badly," the editorial said.

Nazis at Williams

Williams men were on both sides. Otto Lessing, professor of German from 1923 to 1932, was found to be directing Nazi censorship in Berlin. "He didn't seem to be the kind of person to get into this trouble," commented one colleague.

"126 of the 154 Freshmen . . . say the race or color of a man influences their attitude . . . 45 men in the class declared their dislike of the Jewish race, and 20 votes each were cast against Negroes and Japanese."
— 7 May 1940

The Record ceased publication in May of 1943, along with most other college papers. It did not appear again until November of 1944, replacing the Battalion, which served students in military training at the college.

Williams veterans returned in 1946, swelling the college's size with an enrollment of 500 — the most Williams said it could handle. A Victory Convocation, held in October 1946, attracted 2784 graduates, most of the college's living alumni body.

In February of 1947 the Record mobilized a picket line in front of the College Barber Shop after the proprietor attempted to charge a black Williams student triple-price for a haircut. The two-day picket brought the owner a $50 fine for discrimination, as well as accusations that the editorial board orchestrated the whole incident.

The late 1940s and 1950s marked the Record's return to a quiet campus. The paper again directed its focus on sports, along with news on women's colleges. Once again, the headlines told how many women came to Williamstown for the house party weekends (usually between 500 and 600), and most of the inside of those issues consisted in listing every individual student's date and occasionally her home town.

In the Spring of 1957, the College Council announced it would be restricting "Hell Week" hazing activities during fraternity rush, limits that were imposed every few years by the college and always appeared to be in need of re-imposition. That May the Record became the first organization to call for the abolition of fraternities.

"Within the three-and-a-half weeks that I have been a student here, I have discovered the* Record *is the ingrown toenail of the Williams campus . . . why have articles that are lists made into sentences?"
- Susan Read '75, 8 October 1971

Civil Rights

The 1960s came when expected, though the issues associated with that decade arrived at Williams fairly late. Awareness of civil rights issues came slowly, but by February 1962 the Gargoyle Society sponsored an exchange on civil rights, with six Williams students spending a week at historically-black Howard University in Washington, D.C. Later that spring, the Record covered sit-ins by the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) in Chicago, and the end of 1962 brought the Williams Civil Rights Committee to campus.

The Angevine Report of 1962 was the first step towards the abolishment of fraternities. In advocating the college's taking responsibility for housing and feeding all students, the report began the process that ended in fraternities' abolishment in 1968.

In November of 1963, the Record wrote the first of many editorials opposing American involvement in the war in Vietnam. Two years later, in February 1965, a debate was held with professor of political science Frederick Schuman calling the Vietnam War "a march of folly," and Professor Fred Greene arguing for continued U.S. involvement.

Winter Study began in 1968, with a poll showing students overwhelmingly favoring the idea, but worrying that it might be viewed as a "play month."

Three months later marked a more serious note, with 126 professors, 86 percent of the faculty, signing a letter protesting the continuation of the Vietnam War. The letter-writing committee was chaired by professor of History R. G. L. Waite.

More Women, No Frats

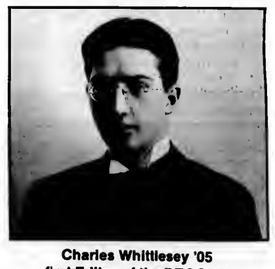
The next school year brought the greatest changes in the school's history. "Trustees to abolish Fraternities," announced the Record in October 1968. The headline said it all.

That Spring, for the first time, a large group of women attended Williams, with 30 exchange students from Vassar enrolling, three years before the College's going co-ed in the fall of 1971.

"Blacks prefer to hang out together" was a headline in March of that year, one month before the Afro-American Society's four-day occupation of Hopkins Hall, which accompanied demands for separate housing and increased minority recruitment. The end of the spring marked the establishment of an Afro-American Center in the basement of Mears House.

Progress goes slowly, though, and a September 1969 Record provided new freshmen with the directions, phone numbers, dress recommendations, and loose descriptions of girls at the local women's colleges. Two weeks later a letter from several women at Green Mountain College protested the Record's nicknaming their school "the Groin."

In February of 1970 the Record met with competition in the form of the Williams Advocate, a paper designed to provide a forum for opinions and a chance for the "New Journalism," a looser and more literary style, to be practiced on campus. The Record claimed to welcome the Advocate's appearance.



In 1970 the war in Vietnam, an issue since 1963, took center stage, and May 5, 1970 saw an indefinite student strike being declared in response to President Nixon's escalation of the war. The faculty voted three days later to offer students a variety of ways to complete their work, including receiving "Pass" grades or finishing work in the fall. The Record supported the strike if students used their time in "a constructive manner."

The ReAd

The Williams Record-Advocate made its first appearance in February 1972, the merger of the Record and the Advocate (which is not related to the Advocate with offices on Spring Street).

The Record praised the Advocate's "innovative alternative to boring, staid college journalism." For three years the ReAd published opinion and opinionated reporting, and provided the campus with a combative newspaper.

The ReAd then went bankrupt. In April 1974 the cash ran out, closing the Record for the first time since World War II. Its editors blamed the stoppage on low advertising revenues. Two issues were published at the end of the year, with the paper borrowing money from College Council to fund those.

Charles Whittlesey '05
first Editor of the RECORD

Amherst in 1974 announced a step towards co-education. The ReAd advised, "Amherst, you have taken the first step on a difficult, if interesting, road trip. Don't fail on your ass."

In 1975 the "-Advocate" name was dropped from the newspaper's banner. The Williams Record returned, promising to uphold the Advocate's unique perspective on the campus.

The late seventies brought changes in the production and look of the Record. In 1978, it reduced its frequency from two issues per week to one. The Gothic text typeface of the banner was replaced by a lighter, simpler Garamond typeface.

The Record entered the 1980's as an agressive paper, though it retained touches of informality. Major articles included coverage of the hunger strike for divestment early in 1983, as well as many other pro-divestment actions. The administrations's responses to these actions and the creation of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility were also closely followed.

In the mid-1980's, the college administration experienced an influx of new people, including President Francis Oakley in 1985, Whatever else can be said (and we can sure say it), the Record has survived 100 years.

This article was written by Harwell Wells, Chuck Samuelson and John McDermott. It was reported by Katie Albright, John Canty, Sara Hansen, Mike LeBauer, McDermott, Al Mottur, Anne O'Malley, Samuelson, Debbie Snyder, Joe Thorndike, Stewart Verdery, and Wells.

ple, she witnessed a huge man, a Hari Krishna, doing body length push-ups rhythmically.

Sarai was her first small village, where beautiful children with bright eyes did not brush their hair. The girls and young women of the village were fascinated by her jewellery. She took note of the gold that was dripping from their fingers and noses; they were puzzled, and probably considered her life dull.

She collapsed in Agra, as I suppose was inevitable somewhere during the journey. After having stared at the fabled marble, on the walk back from the Taj Mahal she looked at a boy who was selling postcards. Her hair was spiky, and she asked him if he went to school, if he felt that life was hard, if he was happy, if he was hungry. He cheerfully answered yes to all questions, and tears started from her eyes and she shoved money into his hands. He kept smiling at her as she hid her eyes.

About halfway through her tour, however, she became tired of being followed by beggar children selling trinkets. At first she could never have her fill of them, they were so shabby and innocent. Her car, which trundled from temple to craft shop to hotel, was the vehicle of Western tourism, she thought grimly. After a while she learned to look down when she climbed out, to march through the crowd without recognizing it.

One day, in need of some quiet, she situated herself comfortably on the lawn of the Rambagh Palace in Jaipur, with shade and roses about her. Waiters in fiercely ironed linen brought her Continental dishes and tea. She then spent money on herself, buying books in the hotel shop. She could not keep herself from the silk shops. These escapes were necessary, and soon revived her zeal to plunge outside and breathe the most exciting smells.

One morning she was up before the dawn to catch the sunrise down by the Ganga, off Benares. There was a thick fog when she arrived, and the song of the priests. Along the steps pilgrims poured forth to bathe in the purifying waters.

As the end of her trip neared, she felt unfulfilled. She was uneasy that she might depart without having satisfied the familiar cravings of a fading imperialism. She returned to New Delhi, and on the last day she attended a polo match. After an unendurable wait in customs, followed by more subtle torture at sea, she arrived in London. Her friends met with roses, and anxious inquiries regarding her health, and her purchases. The ritual was complete.

for the spot behind Wesleyan," he said.

UMass won all the other men's races. The Ephs were seven seconds off the pace in the JV eight, eight seconds off in the freshmen heavyweight eight, and twenty seconds off in the freshmen lightweight eight.

The varsity women (7-3) won a hard fought race by edging out Columbia, Lowell and UMass. The Ephwomen led by a length at 1000 meters and held off Columbia's last second surge to win by 0.4 seconds. Coach Chris Cruz accepted the win but was not pleased with her team's performance. "The boat is still rough and sluggish. They have some polishing to do before the Dad Vail Championships," she said.

Williams also won the freshmen women's race with a time of 7:35.4, five seconds ahead of second place Columbia. The second freshman eight, however, finished behind UMass and Columbia with an 8:07.4.

Next Saturday, Williams will travel to Lake Waramaug in Connecticut to compete in a regatta against Trinity, Ithaca, Marist, and Union.

ing a battle between Jon Fisher '87 and Amherst star Bill Flannery. The race went out fast (61 seconds for the first lap), as 'Fish' settled in behind Flannery. With 350 yards to go, the senior passed Flannery, holding his lead until the final curve, when the Flannery showed his speed and kicked in for a narrow victory. However, the heroic effort of the Eph co-captain inspired his mates, and they ran with physical abandon for the rest of the afternoon.

Andre Lopez '87 took care of Flannery in the 880. The scheming Lord Jeffs attempted to box Lopez out of position with two runners blocking his way. Lopez was content to sit behind them for the first lap and wait to make his move. As the pace picked up on the second lap, the Amherst runner, Mark Evans, blocking Lopez in the second lane, fell two steps behind his counterpart Flannery in lane one, and Lopez squirted through the hole.

Lopez then put on a surge for the next 200 yards that made the rest of the field look pedestrian. "After the surge," he said, "I looked back to the outside to see where Flannery was and I couldn't see him. I then looked to the inside expecting him to be right there, but he was 40 yards behind. I thought he had more in him."

Once Lopez was out of reach, Evans and Flannery tried the same manuever on Dave Nadelman '89, attempting to keep him in fourth place. But the Williams sophomore was too quick for Evans, and he breezed by to take third place, rendering the Amherst tactic futile.

Perhaps the word futile is an apt description for the attempts of Amherst and Wesleyan throughout the day. They never had a chance to avoid being overpowered by the Eph squad.

Date-rape

While the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) discusses and draws up plans for instituting new door locks and better lighting around the campus, other groups are talking about what can and should be done to prevent date-rape.

Rob Wieman '87, a member of the Gargoyle Society, said a two-fold approach should be taken. "The first is educational and attitudinal. People don't recognize the real incidence of sexual harassment. The second should be helping people who have been victimized before or at Williams."

After the panel which was held in March, three other immediate events were scheduled. The first was a workshop given by Roberta Russell of the Pittsfield Rape Crisis Center about safe behavior and mental precautions for women.

Gargoyle Society coordinated the second event, an open discussion about dating and male-female relations and communications. Wieman said that after the rape the society talked about date-rape and male-female relations at Williams.

"The rape upset a lot of people and raised a lot of more universal issues that have not in the past and are not being dealt with in the best way," Wieman said.

The third event conceptualized was a discussion group to be run by Dr. John Howland of the college's Psychological Counseling Service. He described his idea of this group as a personal discussion group in which a small and permanent number of people would be able to talk about sexism, sexuality, intimacy or other of their concerns.

Howland plans to initiate this group next fall with an all-campus mailing, inviting all those interested to participate. Howland specified that the membership in this group would be small and static. "The issue about it's being closed," he said, "is that people can express stuff and get to know one another."

Spear said, "In the gray area of date-rape, the more we learn to articulate our feelings and respect each other the more it will help." She said that she felt that workshop on safer behaviors and CUL's proposal to install a new system of building locks were designed to prevent violent rapes. Date-rape, she said, seems to stem more from miscommunication. "We need to be moving on both fronts."

Spear said that Peer Health and The Feminist Alliance, as well as the Gargoyle Society, have been continually concerned with addressing the issue of miscommunication between the sexes. The consensus, according to Wieman and Hans Humes '87, also a member of the Gargoyle Society, is that Williams has certain structural problems and specific institutional programs and services should be set up and made available to students.

Many different ideas are being considered and discussed. One idea is to expand the role of Peer Health in giving entry talks to freshmen to include date rape and sexual pressures. Said Wieman, "People should know that the problem exists."

Research is being done into the kinds of programs other colleges have institutionalized.

"Programs at other schools vary widely," Dean of the College Stephen Fix said. "It is clear that everyone at the college can benefit from education on a variety of subjects about how students relate to one another."

"A lot of impetus for change is coming from the students, which is important because the most benefit will come when students are helping to benefit each other," he said.

Softball swept by Trinity, beats Holyoke

by Chris Adams

With two out and a Mt. Holyoke runner on third in the bottom of the seventh inning, Lori Schaen '89 went deep into the hole to throw out the batter and preserve a 7-7 tie for pitcher Nancy Hedeman '89. The play was the turning point in the team's 12-7 win as the Ephs' record stands at 3-3 after a Saturday doubleheader loss to Trinity.

Spurred by Schaen's great play, Missy Crouchley '89 (3-4 with two doubles) drew a walk to lead off the eighth against Holyoke, and the Ephwomen then used four hits, including a two-run double by Darca Boom '87, to get five runs. The outburst gave the Ephs a 12-7 victory in what Coach Harry Sheehy called simply "a great game" in which the Ephs did everything they had to do to win. Timely hitting and clutch fielding raised the Ephs' record to 3-1 after an earlier win over Skidmore and a loss to Union.

Saturday, the team traveled to Trinity for a doubleheader and "got hammered," according to Sheehy. The Ephwomen were greeted off the bus by a 16-run Bantam first inning. The team was plagued by an error and some walks without which the inning could have ended with much less damage. They settled down after the first, as Hedeman held the Bantams to just two more runs the rest of the way. The Ephs picked up five runs with first baseman Victoria Ballard '87 and second baseman Christina Oehling '87 each slapping out two hits, including Ballard's run-scoring triple.

3 Trinity brooms Ephs

In the second game, the Ephs tallied a first inning run on singles by Hedeman and Oehling, but were then handcuffed the remaining innings, while the Bantams used first and fifth inning rallies, capped off a by a six-run sixth, to pull away for a 14-1 win.

The team goes to RPI tomorrow, and hosts Wesleyan in a Saturday doubleheader at 1:00.

Baseball

'88, Chris Pachus '88, Rick Hedeman '87, Scott Kennedy '89 and Billy Schwartz '90 all picked up RBI's in a five-run frame. When John Shaw '87 knocked in two more in the third, Williams looked to be in good shape for a sweep. But a leadoff homer by Colby's Skip O'Leary touched off a three-run third against Eph hurler Scott Garfield '88 to cut the gap to 8-4.

Williams' bats fell silent, tallying only on RBI-double by Hedeman in the sixth, while Colby worked against Eph reliever Kennedy. The soph was overpowering at times, striking out six in three innings of work, but yielded three hits and a walk that plated three runs after a two-out, none-on situation in the sixth. The outburst put Colby up 10-9, and when the Ephs went out one-two-three in the seventh, Colby had managed a split.

On Friday, Bowdoin had scored three times in the bottom of the eighth to win 7-4. Jim Duquette led the Ephs with four hits, and Pachus had two RBI's in the losing cause. Seth Lawry '87 threw two solid innings in middle relief in back of starter Rob Blanck '89.

Against Amherst, Williams jumped out to a 4-0 first inning lead and starter Chris Conway '89 held the Jeffs in check through six-plus innings to earn his second win. When Amherst challenged in the eighth with three runs, Kennedy slammed the door with one and two-thirds of hitless relief to pick up a save. Beisito had three hits and two RBI's while Pachus plated three runs. Shaw had an unusual day at the plate with five walks.

The Ephs played A.I.C. yesterday and hosted Castleton State today on the first game on Cole Field. Thursday, the squad travels to Middlebury before hosting Amherst Saturday in a 1:00 doubleheader.

'B' Golfers take Eph Classic; five travel to New Englands

by Ted Ruger

Last Saturday's Eph Classic at the Taconic was full of surprises. First of all, the Williams 'B' team golfers finished ahead of the college's 'A' squad. Even more shocking was the fact that the 'B' golfers went on to capture first place overall in the eleven team tournament.

The classic is an annual event played in two-man, best-ball format. Golfers enter in pairs and count only the better score on a given hole towards their combined score. Each team consists of three pairs of golfers.

The Eph 'B' team combined for a score of 216 to lead all teams. The pairs of Tim McKone '87 and John Han '89 (68), Will Hong '90 and Carter Brothers '90 (72) and Chas Foehl '87 and Rob Sullivan '87 (76) combined for the winning total.

Coach Rick Pohle, who has stressed the overall depth of the team all season, did not seem greatly surprised by the 'B' team's success. "We've got twelve very capable players on our team right now," said Pohle. "It was really kind of arbitrary how I split the golfers up."

However, without the team's depth, failure rather than success would have been the watchword of the day as the Eph 'A' team, with previously good scorers Mike Harrington '88 and Tim Frechette '89, shot a disappointing 229, 13 strokes off the lead and in eighth place overall.

In action earlier in the week, Williams defeated Trinity 445-453 in an away match on Tuesday. A.I.C., also in the match, did not have enough golfers to field a card. The victory over the Bantams gave the squad a 3-0 record in head-to-head competition.

Based on their past performances, five Eph golfers, Harrington, Frechette, McKone, Guy Kurtz '87 and Ian Lapey '89, traveled to Cape Cod on Sunday for the New England Championships to be held yesterday and today. Over fifty other schools were expected to send teams to the tournament.

Pohle was confident before leaving for the Cape: "I've got five real good golfers who I think can compete with anyone," he said.

Now there's more than one way to get through college.

To get ahead in college, it helps if you choose a brilliant roommate. Like a Macintosh™ personal computer. And now there are two models to choose from.

The Macintosh Plus, which comes with one 800K disk drive and a full megabyte of memory (expandable to four).

And the new Macintosh SE. Which comes with either two built-in 800K drives, or one drive and an internal 20-megabyte hard disk. As well as a choice of two new keyboards.

Inside, the SE also has an expansion slot, so you can add a card that lets you share information over a campus-wide network. Or another card that lets you run MS-DOS programs.

Whichever Macintosh you choose, you can use the latest, most advanced software. And that means you'll be able to work faster, better and smarter.

No two ways about it.

The power to be your best.

W. Lacrosse

The 4-3 women's lacrosse team got itself halfway to the Little Three title with a 12-9 victory over Wesleyan in Middletown on Saturday. High-scoring Mo Flaherty '90 led the Eph attack, scoring five goals and adding an assist. The game featured a much more balanced attack as seven players scored goals and three more added assists. The Williams attack was described by one player as, "sharp but still a little impatient. We could hold the ball a bit longer."

The Ephs' only lapse occurred with about six minutes remaining, but it was only momentary. Leading by seven goals, the women allowed Wesleyan to score three quick goals before coming back to life and putting the win in the books. The coaches cited strong defense by Katie Hogan '87 and Beth McNulty '90 in stopping the Cardinal attack, which was much stronger than anticipated, particularly in the late rally.

Earlier in the week, the Ephs lost 10-3 to Trinity ,the defending NAIAC champion, on the road. Coach Chris Mason put the loss in perspective, saying, "Trinity has been scoring around twenty goals a game; they're probably the best team in the conference, but we still gave them a good game."

A victory in today's game at Middlebury is a key to the team's chances of receiving a NAIAC playoff berth. The playoff berth would force postponement of Saturday's home game against the hated Lord Jeffs.

Cycling

The men's cycling team met with some disappointment at the Cornell stage race April 17 and 18. In the opening team trial, Williams made a strong showing, placing 14th out the 27 teams. Later that afternoon during the criterium stage, fortune turned against the Ephs as a six rider breakaway lapped and disqualified the entire main pack.

Williams hoped to regain some ground the following day in the final road race, but a series of falls shattered their chances. Michael Grow '90 went down in a 30-rider crash at the beginning of the B race, and Matt McQueen '89 endured a similiar fate in the C start, but went on to finish. Dave Greenberg '88 was among the leaders with only three miles to go when he tumbled into a ditch, suffering a broken nose and rib. Only sophomore Mark Reid kept his wheels to finish in the pack.

Kirsten Froburg '90 was the only Williams' woman riding, and she managed to save the Ephs from despair. The freshman wonder took ninth in the criterium and came out the next day to mash gears with the tough Cornell and Rutgers teams. In the last stretch of the road race, she held off many attackers to take sixth place.

Froburg will be one to watch as the Williams squad goes to the Eastern Collegiate Cycling Federation Championships at RPI this weekend.

W. Rugby

The women's rugby club faced worthy opponents in last Saturday's abbreviated version of the traditional alumni game. Though only four Used Bags made the pilgrimage to Williamstown, they were triumphant in their mission, tallying a score of 4-0 with the help of several A-side players.

The Used Bags displayed an admirable effort as they dragged their tired bodies onto the pitch to reluctantly begin the match. After the whistle blew, however, their presence was immediately felt. Hooker Slink Roberto '86 won the majority of scrumdowns for her team and provided excellent support for the line. Used Bags dominated the line with former greats Sunica Edelstein '85, Sara Suchman '86 and Barb Cooper '83 playing standoff, inside and outside.

Playing in her first game of the season due to a chicken pox injury, senior wing Ann-Marie Plankey showed that she is back and better than ever with her acrobatic ball catches and explosive runs.

The game's only try was a superb team effort of line support. The ball travelled quickly down the Used Bag/A-side line with fine curling by Suchman and Mary Petersen '87. Scrumhalf Steph Jacon '87 took the ball the final ten meters to make the score 4-0.

After Saturday's tuneup, the entire WWRFC is ready to face its most important test of the season when it plays Amherst Saturday.

From The Locker Room

by Stewart Verdery

The NBA is expanding and it's about time. Fans in the deserving cities of Charlotte, Minneapolis, Orlando and Miami will soon be treated to the spectacle that is NBA hoops. There are those who say that the quality of the play will be diminished and, yes, for the first few years, the expansion teams will likely have problems competing.

But do you remember the last expansion team? It was the lowly Dallas Mavericks who were led in their first year by the infamous Jim Spanarkel. Just seven years later, however, the Mavs are the second-best team in the West after using the draft to get stars Aguirre and Blackman. So while the Charlotte Spirit won't initially strike fear in the eyes of the Lakers or Hawks, you can bet, especially if Lefty Driesell becomes coach, that they won't be in the basement for long.

The areas that have been chosen are deserving: Charlotte is in the middle of college basketball's hotbed, Minneapolis supports the Twins and Vikings well, Orlando has a solid financial base and Miami has a proven coach in Billy Cunningham. With the increases in NBA attendance and television ratings, there is no reason to think that these franchises will go the way of the Seattle Pilots, Virginia Squires or Team Tennis.

There is plenty of talent to go around, although for the first few years after expansion it won't be distributed evenly. The NBA is on the rise, and the new four teams will only enhance the slogan: The NBA is FAN-tastic!

by Al Mottur

There will be four expansion teams added to the NBA in 1988 and '89, a move that I think is a mistake. It is one thing to add a single franchise (note the success of the Dallas Mavericks) but quite another to foolishly add four.

Where are these team's players going to come from? Four new teams means 44-48 new players in the NBA, roughly a 17% increase over the current player pool. And since the teams can only choose from the 8th to the 12th best player on current teams, these programs are going to stink. How about this scenario -- (Granville Walters rises for the tip, it goes to Fred Roberts who dishes it to Jay Murphy. Murphy fakes once, passes to Bill Wennington who shoots --- AIRBALL!)

Clearly for the first few years of their existence, these teams are going to be horrible. Pro-expansionists like Stu will argue that this is to be expected, and eventually things will turn around. Well, there already are a few horrible teams in the NBA. We don't need any more. Imagine the nightmare of four more San Diego Clippers.

Furthermore, the talent that currently makes the NBA such a great league will be diluted by the influx of new players who in previous years might not have made any squad whatsoever. The only benefactors are the host cities, their fans and the players who otherwise would have been gathering pine needles on other team's benches. They should not be the overriding concern of the NBA. The overall quality of the league should be.

A-side ruggers fall to Vermont

by Sean Brennan

The Williams Rugby Football Club hit the pitch on Saturday to battle it out against one of the best rugby clubs in the Northeast, the University of Vermont. With a disappointing day for the A-side and an extremely strong win for the B-side, the White Dogs came out of this Parents' Weekend with a widened perspective on the game of rugby.

The A-side came down to Cole Field ready to play the talented Vermonters, and the first half of the match brought promise that it was to be an exciting game. UVM scored first with a try and a conversion to give them a 6-0 lead, but a determined Williams side fought back with fire, but scored only a penalty kick by Roger Merriam '87 to make the score 6-3 at the half.

The second half was one full of mistakes and frustration for the A's, as UVM hit their groove while the Ephs wavered offensively and defensively. The majority of the half saw a very skilled UVM squad put in try after try with the help of an extremely strong and disciplined scrum that played an excellent game. As UVM's score rose, so did the frustration of the Williams 15, who were never able to mount a successful offensive. The match ended with Williams scoring only the 20-3 rout of Wesleyan 3rd straight lax victory

by Marc McDermott

Roaring to their third consecutive victory in impressive fashion, the Eph laxmen trounced the hapless Cardinals of Wesleyan on Saturday by a devastating 20-3 score. Fresh off wins over Trinity and Union, the Ephs steamrolled the Redbirds and upped their season record to 5-2.

Rallying with three unanswered goals after Wesleyan scored the game's first two, the Ephs took the lead for good when freshman scoring sensation Bobby Santry plugged one off a pass from Chris Swindell '88. After the Santry score, Williams dominated, as Wesleyan found itself trailing 8-3 at the half.

Coach Renzie Lamb attributed his team's success to its superior ball-handling skills. Said Lamb, "Wesleyan couldn't control the ball. They couldn't take possession or get it off the ground." Evidence of this domination can be seen in the stat sheet which shows that Williams retrieved a total of 63 groundballs compared to Wesleyan's 34.

Santry led the scoring for the Ephmen with two tallies and three assists, while Swindell and Doug Gilbert '89 each had two goals and two assists.

Night win over Union

The Ephs opened the week with a thrilling 8-6 victory over Union. Playing on artificial turf and under the lights for the first time this year, the team had trouble getting untracked. But by the end of a sloppily played first half, the Ephs had jumped to a slim 2-1 lead as Santry ripped the nets twice, and goalkeeper Robbie Lambert '90 turned back all but one of Union's shots.

Williams opened the second half at a furious pace as, after an initial Union score, they reeled off four unanswered goals from the sticks of senior Steve Patterson (two), Tim Oliver '90 and Swindell to run their lead to 6-2.

With the game seemingly in hand, the Ephs almost allowed a replay of their earlier 7-6 loss to Tufts as Union struck back for four goals of their own. Two fluke goals, including a one-handed shot, and penalties hurt Williams as its lead disappeared into a 6-6 tie.

The Eph defense tightened as it refused to lose another close game. Gilbert put the Ephs ahead to stay before an open net goal with seconds left to gave the Ephs their third win of the post-Florida season.

This week the squad plays Middlebury tomorrow at home and then hosts Amherst Saturday at 2:00. These two games are of huge importance to the team's playoff hopes. Last year, the laxmen lost to Middlebury in the first round of the ECAC's. And Amherst is one of the more highly touted squads in New England. Wins over both teams could spell a playoff bid for the Ephmen.

Women, men maul Little 3 track foes

by Steve Brody

The powerful Eph men's and women's track teams crushed their competition in the Little Three Championships at Amherst on Saturday. The men's team notched its 10th title in the last 15 years, while the women posted their second straight victory. Both teams showed complete domination on the track--the men's team scored more points than the combined total of the Amherst and Wesleyan squads (96 to 53 for Amherst and 37 for Wesleyan), and on the women's side the battle was for second place, as the Ephs posted 83 points to 48 for each of their competitors.

The women's team started the meet on a sour note, as its 4x100 yard relay finished out of the scoring because of a bad handoff. However, the Eph milers put the team back on track, as Becky Conklin '87 and Jen Morris '89 blew by their Wesleyan opponents for a 1-2 finish. From this point, the women's team was led by freshman Karlyn McNall and (once again) by sophomore Dawn Macauley.

The two stellar performers posted a total of 37 points. McNall showed incredible endurance and diverse athletic ability by scoring points in six events. She captured first in the long jump with a leap of 15'7", second in the hammer throw, shot put, triple jump, and high hurdles, and third in the javelin throw. Her second in the high hurdles was part of an Eph sweep in the event. Macauley was first with a time of 16.8 while Noriko Honda '89 was third.

Nat McCormick unleashes a toss of the javelin in Little Three action over the weekend. Both the men and the women destroyed Amherst and Wesleyan by a wide margin. (Somers) Macauley also led the Ephs to a 1-2-3 finish in the 440 yard intermediate hurdles. Susan Gray '90 was second while Honda was third. Macauley won the 440 yard run and was part of the second place mile relay team to complete her scoring.

Swart leads men

Unlike the women's team, the men started well in the 4x100. Pierre Swart '90 took the final handoff even with the competition, but they looked at the freshman's back the rest of the way as he powered down the straightaway to finish well ahead. It was a good day for Swart, who also won the 220 yards (23.0), and took second in the 100 and the javelin.

The mile was one of the day's most competitive races, featur-

Maine slugfests yield baseball 1 win

by Stewart Verdery

Playing three games in 24 hours, the Eph baseball team split a doubleheader against Colby Saturday after a loss to Bowdoin on Friday. The trip to the wilderness of Maine followed a 9-6 victory over Amherst on Tuesday that marked their first effort in Little Three action in 1987.

The twinbill against Colby saw a total of 46 runs cross the plate in the two seven-inning games as Williams held on for a 14-13 win the opener only to lose a 8-1 lead in the nightcap in a 10-9 defeat. The windy conditions, short fences and a good hitters' background caused "more line drives than I've ever seen," according to Coach Jim Briggs.

In the 14-13 game, Williams took a 3-0 lead on junior rightfielder Sean Logan's triple in the second. The lead was upped to 11-1 after a three-run fourth and a five-run outburst in the fifth that was capped by second baseman Steve Beisito '87's two-run homer. In the bottom of the fifth, Colby third baseman Jamie Arsenault touched Eph starter Mike Barbera for a dinger, but Williams still held a 11-2 lead.

The teams traded two-run sixth innings before coming to the bottom of the seventh with Williams up 14-4. Arsenault hit his second four-bagger to start the frame and then, nine batters, one homer, one error, three walks and two hits later, narrowed the lead to 14-13 with a grand slam off reliever Bill Ryan '88. The tying run reached first after a single but was then erased as part of a 6-4-3 double play to end the game, with Ryan picking up his fourth save in back of Barbera's second win.

Colby rebounds

As in the first game, Williams jumped out to a big early lead. In the top of the first, Lew Collins

7-3 women's crew slides by Columbia by 00.04 seconds

by Chuck Samuelson

The men's and women's varsity crew teams and the freshmen women's crew squad won on Saturday in a home regatta at Lake Onota in Pittsfield.

The varsity men finished the 2100 meter course in 6:15.6, nearly seven seconds ahead of the second place University of Lowell. The University of Massachusetts at Amherst finished third, only one second behind Lowell. The Ephs' win, which left their record at 8-1, came on the heels of an overhaul by coach Peter Wells. "I completely changed the seatings from last week — only three men were left in their old seats," said Wells. The result of the change was that "a boat that (earlier had problems) was much smoother, cleaner, and had better slide control."

Wells said that the win will help Williams' seeding in the upcoming Dad Vail Championships. "We should be ahead of Coast Guard and Tufts in the New England seedings now, and will be battling Trinity and UNH

Secretary to the Faculty Meredith Hoppin and Dean of the College Stephen Fix count votes for one of the CEP proposals at last Wednesday's faculty meeting. (Hazen)

Faculty approves tutorials, ups requirements

by Jocelyn Shadforth

The faculty last week voted overwhelmingly to approve the institution of an optional tutorial program and an increase in distribution requirements to three courses per division.

The measures adopted at the faculty's meeting Wednesday were both products of the curricular review conducted by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) over the past two years.

The tutorial prgram will begin within two years, while the change in distribution requirements will apply to the Class of 1991.

Another CEP proposal, which would allow departments to offer a discretionary contract minor, was sent back to the committee for further discussion.

At the two-hour meeting, CEP chairman Thomas Jorling presented the tutorial proposal as a challenge to faculty that would also enhance the writing, speaking and thinking ability of students, as well as provide professors with a new opportunity for educational initiative.

"Provide diversity"

"The tutorials will not only provide diversity to the faculty and students but will enhance the educational enterprise of the entire college," Jorling said.

Assistant Professor of History William Wagner said, "I'm not here to bury the tutorial but to praise it. It provides an opportunity to introduce the tutorial into the curriculum, a valuable pedagogical tool to allow students to express themselves orally and enhance their writing."

Wagner pointed out, however, that repetition could become a problem for a professor teaching a tutorial to five pairs of students, and that time constraints would limit the amount of reading tutorial students would be able to do, making their exposure to subjects superficial.

Concern was also expressed that the workload for professors teaching a tutorial would increase and that students would take tutorials for the wrong reasons. "We could end up with the same problem as Winter Study," Assistant Professor of German Bruce Kleffer said. "Some tutorials will be perceived as more difficult than others."

"A lumpiness problem"

Professor of Political Science Fred Greene also raised the question of placement for students not getting into tutorials.

60 students rally with the WBGLU

by John McDermott

Sixty students and a handful of faculty members gathered Friday to show solidarity with gays, lesbians and bisexuals at Williams.

"Yes, we're gay and yes, we're here at Williams," sophomore Eliza Kent told people spread out on the grass and concrete near the front of Chapin Hall. "But we're happy to be here and we're proud to be gay."

The rally featured poetry and song in addition to speakers. It was part of "Lesbian and Gay Awareness Day," which also included a picnic, a party, and screenings of the films "The Life and Times of Harvey Milk" and "Lianna."

"We are here to celebrate our progress and also to re-evaluate our ongoing direction," said John Malcolm '87, a member of the Williams Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Union (BGLU), which organized the day's events.

"In the past five years, we have expanded all the programs that the BGLU has sponsored, ever," Malcolm said. "That's Kwitter speaks out on 'disenfranchisement'

by Debbie Snyder

When the faculty voted on the tutorial and increased distribution requirements proposals last Wednesday, several members of the faculty were not present. Associate Professor of Astronomy Karen Kwitter had it recorded in the minutes that faculty who have children at the Williams College Childcare Center, which closes at 5:30 p.m., had to leave before the votes were taken.

Kwitter requested at 5:20 p.m., before the first vote had been taken, if faculty members who had to leave could vote by proxy. President of the College Francis Oakley responded that no provision for proxy voting at faculty meetings exists. Kwitter then asked that the secretary record in the minutes that some faculty members who wished to vote could not.

"I objected, because we were not allowed to excercise our prerogative to vote as faculty members," Kwitter said. "It's not that I have an inflated sense of my own importance, it's just the principle. I want to be able to excercise my rights as a faculty member."

Oakley and Dean of the Faculty John Reichert said that the issue has not been officially raised before, and now that it has, the Steering Committee will examine possible alternative that would resolve the present conflict.

"There's nothing sacrosanct about a meeting time," Oakley said, suggesting that one possibility is that the Steering Committee reschedule faculty meetings, which have traditionally lasted from 4:00 p.m. to 6:00 p.m.

Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong, who chairs the Steering Committee, said the committee will solve the problem over the summer. She said that the conflict between the daycare center closing time and the faculty meetings affects at least a dozen faculty members.

Tong said the Steering Committee will explore several solutions, including changing the time for faculty meetings to the evening, ending the meetings by 5:15 p.m., restructuring the calendar so that no classes are scheduled on a given afternoon and extending the closing time for the daycare center until 6:00 p.m. once a month for the meetings.

Sending smokers a signal

In the face of mounting scientific evidence which suggests that second-hand smoke can cause significant health risks, institutions across the country have been forced to re-evaluate their policies on smoking. Williamstown undertook such a re-evaluation this past year, and the result was a much more restrictive town ordinance governing smoking in public places.

Prompted in part by the ordinance, Williams College is now involved in its own policy re-evaluation. The most recent proposal, discussed at last week's College Council meeting, has much to recommend. Indeed, it forms a strong basis upon which to build a comprehensive policy.

The proposal — originally slated to go into effect April 1, but now postponed, probably until next September — forbids smoking in almost all public spaces, including dining halls, classrooms and Sawyer Library. Indeed, it seems the only places the measure leaves open to smoking seem to be individual rooms and suites.

Such a restrictive policy might seem unjustly harsh to smokers; by severely limiting smoking areas, the policy promises to demand significant lifestyle changes on the part of many students, faculty and staff. But the very nature of a smoking policy is restrictive; to protect the rights of non-smokers, some sacrifice must be made on the part of smokers.

One sacrifice called for in the revised policy is inappropriate. The policy would disallow smoking throughout the library. The current policy bans smoking on all floors but the basement. Such an ban would be too great a hardship for those smokers who find cigarettes and studying to be a close, working relationship.

The answer is to reserve a portion of the library basement — perhaps as small as the Van Alstyne lounge — as a smoking area.

With this modification, the proposal will do much to better the living and working conditions of the community, while recognizing the needs of those who smoke. It does put the burden of sacrifice on smokers, but that is the only way that non-smokers rights' can be respected.

Record feature of 'Man on the Quad' shows sexist insensitivity

To the editors:

In the March 17, 1987, edition of the Record, six students were asked: "Do you think 'Man on the Quad' is sexist?" Of the five responses that actually answered the question, three stated that the name was sexist.

It seems to me impossible to deny that 'Man on the Quad' is a sexist title, simply because it implies that only views of male students are of any particular interest. The more significant question, and one that the Record editor should ask themselves, is whether they consider the sexist aspects of 'Man on the Quad' to be offensive. Since no attempt has been made to change the title, it appears that the Record is not concerned about the continued use of a sexist name that clearly excludes half of the student body.

The Record's continued use of the title 'Man on the Quad' is disturbing, because it suggests a lack of concern for the use of sexist language. A more disturbing aspect of the sexist nature of 'Man on the Quad,' however, is the consistent bias toward men demonstrated in the actual choice of students. Since January 13, 41 men and 19 women have been interviewed on 'Man on the Quad'; this is roughly twice as many men as women, a proportion that is completely unrepresentative of the actual ratio of men and women at Williams. Every issue except two since January have selected more men than women. In one issue, no women at all were interviewed.

In the March 17 issue, when the actual question about the sexist nature of 'Man on the Quad' was at issue, only one woman was selected to respond to the question. In the last four issues, including March 17, 17 men and five women have been featured in 'Man on the Quad'; based on this proportion, Williams would be 77 percent male and 23 percent female.

These figures suggest that the Record's insensitivity to sexist language is matched by an equal insensitivity to sexist content. By demonstrating such a marked bias toward men, the Record is creating a pattern that seems to deny the significance of the opinions and comments of women at Williams. I am not accusing the Record of a deliberate policy to discriminate against women, but it seems clear from the actual figures that a pattern of sexist bias has occured.

It is a pity that the Record has failed to demonstrate a genuine sensitivity to the impressions and the implications that are generated by both the language and the content of 'Man on the Quad.' The Record's position in favor of appointing women faculty to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions suggests that the editors are interested in reforming traditional areas of discrimination. Until the Record becomes aware of its own sexist characteristics, however, its commitment to the reduction of discrimination will remain uncertain.

Bloom's accusations not based on fact, didn't belong in Record

To the Editor:

One of the enduring realities of the Williams College experience is having to bear with public attacks on your character should you ever decide to stand up for a strongly-held belief. That is the legacy of 100 years of the Williams Record. I say this as a warning to anyone who finds in themselves the strange impulse to speak out here. Be prepared!

Last week, Glenn Bloom attacked me in the Record, calling me irresponsibie politically and denouncing my character as "inflammatory , arrogant, and distasteful." His attack came as a result of my appearance on the WCFM show Community Affairs — a show I hosted for almost two years but which I no longer host. Glenn claimed that he "called in to offer a question to one of the guests on the show, Martin White." He went on: "My question was misquoted to him, on the air, in such a distorted fashion that it did not convey its point, and as well affirmed views I wished to deny." Then he states that the "individual who made the mistake instructed Martin to inform WCFM's listeners that I had been misquoted. Martin White ignored the instruction."

It was not my job to retract Glenn's statement for the show. I was a guest — not the host! And Glenn was not a guest in absentia. Furthermore, the host did not instruct me to read anything. Glenn took me completely by surprise and I am shocked that he would choose to attack me like that (in the Record) when you have so little at stake in the issue compared to me.

Glenn's "question" called into the show was not a question either time but a statement which basically said what he wrote in his letter last week: "...Not everyone who disagrees with Martin disagrees with him because he is black." I agree, not everyone disagrees with me because I am black. That was not the point.

The host of the show asked me to discuss times when I had felt hostility which had to do with my black African identity. One instance, of many I have experienced, was the series of degrading phone calls and gestures, classically racist, that I received from some members of the Williams community because of my involvement with the crosses. Why Glenn Bloom questions that is his problem.

Glenn denies there is a connection between the oppression blacks in South Africa experience and the oppression blacks in America experience. I think that he should make more of an effort to study the relationships between western culture and racism and colonialism. I would prefer that he leave my character out of the discussion, however, as reducing it to a personality conflict denies the importance of the suffering that real people are experiencing.

Simultaneously, Glenn claims, "Personally, I like Martin as an individual, but disagree with him as a spokesperson for any organization." I have always represented my own convictions and no one else's. However, I think that this statement characterizes what a friend wrote about a few months ago in the Record. Glenn only wants me in parts. If I step outside of my experience and pretend that what an individual says hasn't insulted my dignity and my humanity — then you like me.

Perhaps what most bothered me was not that Glenn chose to call me names, but that he chose the Record in which to do it.

Moreover, it bothered me that the Record chose the title 'Arrogant' to characterize me in Glenn's attack rather than simply 'Misquoted.' The editors made that choice. That is a sign of what I see as true 'Slander!'

How sure can any individual moral judgement be in truth?

by Brian Watson '88

I would like to respond to the opinion piece written by Dilip Nair on the subject of secular tolerance of "fundamentalism." I know that sounds like a trite summarization of the point expressed, but, at a time when we are trying to relieve prejudice in the Williams community, it seemed especially appropriate to make a plea for tolerance. Whether intolerance exists is another matter. Yet there are a couple of points I would like to address.

Yes, it is difficult for people to avoid stereotyping others, and it is often difficult to realize when one person is loosely grouping another person, but when the media bandies about terms like "fundamentalist" and "pentacostalist" it is difficult to see distinguishing qualities. Perhaps we need a "Who's Who" to help people to realize who is a member of which group and what makes each group different. Many people freely associate the Bakkers, for example, with fundamentalism, when they are really both Pentecostal.

It is also difficult for a person to avoid making connections with a fundamentalist they know and any references and or experiences they may have had. Those are not excuses. A person should be judged .... There is the key to the problem. It appears as if judgement occurs. How we make our judgements of people we perceive to be fundamentalist and how they judge secular society is the true source of contention here. It is this sense of judgement that invokes the negative reaction and wariness mentioned. In fact, there are several terms of judgement in this letter to which I experienced a negative reaction.

The phrase "what I perceive sinful in God's eyes" is an interesting one. Does Mr. Nair presume to think he can know what is sinful in God's eyes (For that matter, are fundamentalists the only group of people who lead an "active spiritual life"?). A fundamentalist response to the definition of sin lies in what are termed clear outlines for sin in the Bible. Is the Bible that clear? Or is it possible that people bring emotion to their reading of the Bible? Is it possible that one person's interpretation of sin may mean something else for another person? Most definitely.

There is no accepted meaning for the words of the Bible. We can interpret many words and passages to mean one thing. This has changed, though, with who the reader is. Sometimes it is necessary to take into account who the passage was written for. Why, for example, is God portayed frequently in the Old Testament as being war-like and fierce, when in the New Testament, the focus shifts more towards the love and mercy of God, especially as personified by Christ? Did we, between the age of the Maccabees and the age of Christ, get a new God? I don't think so. It may have a lot to do with the needs people had for God, the society in which they lived, and their own standards of morality. I realize that once again I have made trite summarizations. Let it suffice to say that I recognize my device of rhetoric.

Should we base our morality on the morality of Moses? Is morality an absoiute concept? And should we impose our morality on people who do not think, act, or believe as we do? No. It is the judgement of persons based on this rigid morality that I question. Another phrase that I recall is that "I cannot remain silent in the face of sinful actions." Are Mr. Nair going to tell me what sins I'm committing, or is he speaking of broader issues, or both?

A problem comes with your use of the word of sin. Wrong is a less emotive sensitively described in his April 20 opinion piece.

While I regret to concede that the political left is indeed guilty of presenting a lopsided view of the atrocities of various regimes, Mr. Rakonitz will no doubt admit, as well, that conservatives are no less biased: while liberals de-emphasize the abuses of the Angolan, Nicaraguan, and Soviet regimes, so do conservatives play down the abuses of the contras and other right-wing forces.

The plain fact is that we in the West are engaged, by constantly citing and counterciting human rights abuses, in a morally repugnant dialogue that distorts all our perceptions of real human agony for partisan purposes. My suggestion to Mr. Rakonitz, and to everyone who desires that this mutual hypocrisy end, is to contribute time to such organizations as Amnesty International, which is explicitly nonpartisan.

As for the state of political dialogue on the Williams campus, I further recommend to Mr. Rakonitz that if we all adhere to explanations of our ideologies and to the facts upon which we build them, then perhaps the resulting discourse would be more productive. I don't feel wrong-headed.

In omission of concert, Record exhibits blindness to the arts

To the Editor:

I noticed two errors in the most recent issue of the Record; one was trivial, the other was serious. One was an error of commission, the other an error of omission.

The trivial error of commision had to do with the length of time power was off during the house move. Bernhard Music Center lacked power for four hours.

A far more serious error was one of omission. You did not review the Berkshire Symphony concert of April 24, all the more shameful since a student musician was the featured soloist. Senior music major Amy Champagne played Franck's Symphonic Variations brilliantly, full of confidence and bursting with musicianship. There have been a handful of student musicians in recent years capable of soloing with the BSO, and Amy was among the best of those.

Furthermore, we understand that a reviewer did attend the concert, that she asked Ms. Champagne for the title of her encore (Ginastera's Argentinian Dance) and had called the Music Department office for additional information. If the review was written, why was room not found to print it? You might easily have printed less of the Theatre review, less of the book sale article, and recognized the hard work and excellent achievement of a superiative student musician, to say nothing of the nearly thirty student members of the orchestra, including several principal players and graduating seniors.

Please demonstrate that in the future the Record can be accurate and unbiased in its reporting of news and reviewing of artistic events on campus.

Welcome to Williams Spring!

For yet another year, the idyllic atmosphere of Williams College has been shattered. Life here is disrupted every spring by the same person, a totally unsympathetic and uncaring individual. Her name is Mother Nature.

Unless you spent the last week hibernating on the fourth floor of the library along with the charter of the International Monetary Fund, you probably witnessed the upsetting, mind-boggling, life-worsening change of the weather. It was cold, windy, and snowy — on April 28! I ask you, my fellow students, did Phil Smith tell you about this when you applied to Williams? Doesn't Williams believe in truth in advertising? Perhaps each April there should be a sign on Chapin Beach warning students not to get too used to sitting there in shorts and a t-shirt.

I am just frustrated. I made the big mistake and took my turtlenecks out of my wardrobe and replaced them with shorts. Of course, as soon as I did, the weather changed for the worse.

This weather change has also led to a number of dilemmas.

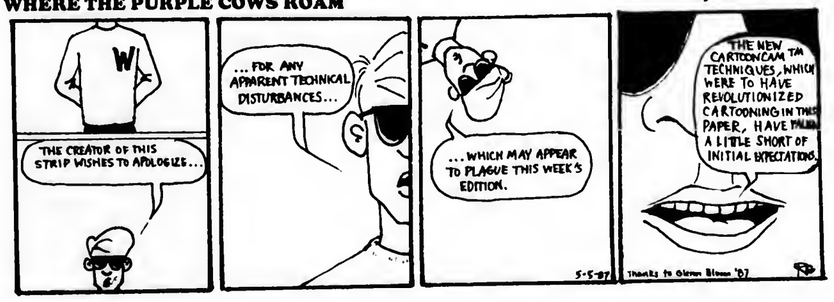
First, an attitude problem quickly develops. I mean, who wants to work when you have to stay inside because it's cold and rainy? It's too logical. I know I won't study inside, unless I know that the temptation exists to blow everything and play wiffleball. Otherwise, I can't complain that I studied on a beautiful day.

Yet, of course, there can be a benefit to this. Someone is bound to say that this weather is primed for studying because the sun doesn't tempt us. I don't believe it, though. What's more tempting, laying outside on a sunny day, or in bed on a rainy day? It's about even for me, and my bed is infinitley more comfortable than the ground.

Second, this type of weather speeds people up. Everyone who thought it's still warm out is running across the campus complaining about the cold, trying to get inside as fast as possible. Warning: walk with your head up during unexpected cold snaps.

Third, when it snows in the last week of April, the weather becomes the only topic of conversation. That's it. "Nice weather, ha, ha, ha." Or perhaps the occasional joke to the ski team member: "Got practice today, Jed?"

Once again, looking at the other side of this, the April snow does take our minds off imminently more important things like the trade war with Japan, the upcoming Presidential election, listening devices in American embassies, and Dwight Gooden's cocaine problem. Those topics were worn out anyway.



Finally, there is a problem with morale. I'm sure we'll all agree that sun correlates highly with morale and snow has a negative correlation with morale. And, yes, I have taken PoliSci stats. Anyway, I'm right. No one wants to do anything. Who can study or do anything constructive when it's snowing during April.

I'm not sure what to do about all this. The admissions office should inform prospectives of this recurring problem. Perhaps the Committee on Undergraduate Life should look into it. I think a presidential committee would be pushing things, but at least the problem would come into view. In closing, I wanted to give all sides in this problem a chance to speak. Unfortunately, Mother Nature was unavailable for comment and did not return my phone calls.

WHERE THE PURPLE COWS ROAM

Fire starts in Williams B; alarms quiet

A mattress in Williams B caught fire last Wednesday night, but failed to set off fire detection systems, although it smoldered for several hours.

Cara McCandless '90 said she fell asleep reading and awoke two hours later to find her mattress burning near her feet.

McCandless was treated at the college Health Center and released the next morning, Director of Health James Corkins said.

The apparent cause of the fire was a lamp, situated between the bed and the wall, which had been left on. McCandless' bedroom and the attached common room filled with smoke.

"The smoke was so thick, I was coughing and my throat was burned," McCandless said. "Later, I had to go outside, I couldn't breathe in the hallway."

McCandless said that after the doors to the hallway had been opened, the alarms still did not go off. Security came immediately when they were phoned, according to McCandless.

Harold Weyers, fire marshall of the college, said the nearest smoke detector was found to be in working order. "It was tested the next morning and it was operational," he said. "There wasn't enough smoke to get to the smoke detectors in the hall. It had to go through two doors. It was a question of time; a few minutes more and it would have gone off."

Weyers said the ideal fire protection would be to install smoke detectors in every room — which would be a considerable expense.

"With that you would have another problem, that of false alarms," he said. "If you had two or three people smoking in a room it would set off the alarms. You have to weigh the costs and benefits."

CC looks at smoking

At its meeting Thursday, the College Council discussed the institution of a new smoking policy for the college. The administration is developing the policy to conform with an ordinance recently enacted by Williamstown selectmen.

Council president Carter Zinn '88 said he met with College Provost Neil Grabois, and that Grabois said he welcomed student input on a draft of the policy.

According to Zinn, the policy would prohibit smoking in dining halls and all "public areas." The policy would allow students to smoke in their rooms, and would allow faculty members to smoke in their offices, unless visitors asked them to stop.

Zinn said the rationale behind the policy is that smokers should not subject others to the potential health hazards that smoking causes.

"Dean Fix is a smoker, and is totally in favor of it," Zinn said.

One point brought up at the meeting was that smokers currently use the basement of Sawyer Library as an area where they can both study and enjoy smoking freely. According to the new policy, students will no longer be able to smoke in the basement.

In other business, Zinn briefly noted that he has seen blueprints for an addition of 25 new parking spaces to the 'I' lot north of Mission Park, near the old Infirmary.

Faculty

He said, "You have 150 people not getting into courses. They're going to be packing electives that are already large. You can't solve the problem by bringing in two or three more instructors because you have a lumpiness problem in the way students choose their courses."

Jorling, a professor of environmental sciences, questioned the degree to which tutorials would change the distribution of students between large and small classes.

Professor of Sociology Robert Friedrichs moved to amend the proposal so that departments would not be required to offer one tutorial. "I would remind you that although the College Council supported this, the students did not wish to have this as a required part of the curriculum," Friedrichs said. "I think the faculty should be at least as wise as the students."

But Friedrichs' amendment was defeated by a vote of 25-76.

The tutorial proposal passed by a 91-12 vote. The faculty Steering Committee had previously determined that the proposal, as well as the change in distribution requirements, would need a 60 pecent majority to be adopted.

Distribution requirements

Jorling opened discussion of a change in distribution requirements by saying that the CEP's proposal built on the existing distribution structure and did not set requirements for the completion of specific courses.

Assistant Professor of Mathematics Deborah Bergstrand, a member of the CEP, said, "The CEP decided that the present requirements were inadequate in protecting the breadth of a liberal arts education and the health of our curriculum. We are acknowledging to our students and alumni the importance of science in a liberal arts curriculum."

Professor of Astronomy Jay Pasachoff noted that the requirement of three courses in each division, with only two courses under the same prefix, would still represent less than 10 percent of a students' total number of courses while at Williams.

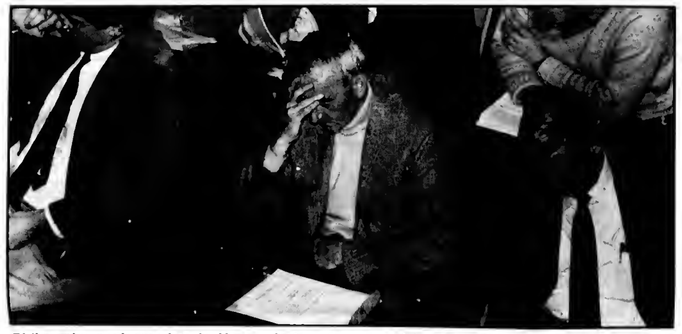
Professor of Philosophy Laszlo Versenyi objected to the increase in requirements. He said the current science offerings did not address the need to acquaint students with a mode of inquiry.

"If these courses do not fulfill the purpose of this proposal, what is the point of raising the requirement?" he asked. "If sciences cannot be accomplished under present requirements, then the courses are being poorly taught."

The distribution proposal was criticized as unimaginative by a number of faculty members because it lacked requirements in non-Western studies, specific laboratory courses, and foreign languages.

"I hope that no one's going to vote against this because it's unimaginative. It's been my experience that the mark of an imaginative proposal is that it gets defeated," Professor of English Michael Bell said.

The proposal passed by a vote of 85 to 13.



The faculty tabled for further discussion the proposal for a contract minor, which would allow departments to grant "minor" status to students who completed a package of courses they selected from within a departmental major.

The proposal was sent back to the CEP after Associate Professor of History Thomas Spear suggested it be amended to allow "minors" to be awarded for work in interdepartmental programs, which currently grant students "concentration" credit. The amendment was supported by Assistant Professor of Political Science Timothy Cook.

During the meeting, Associate Professor of Astronomy Karen Kwitter asked that professors who had to leave the meeting to pick up their children from the daycare center, which closes at 5:30, be permitted to vote by proxy. (See related story, page one).

President of the College Francis Oakley said there currently is no mechanism by which proxy votes can be entered at a faculty meeting. Kwitter asked that an objection to the policy be noted in the record of the meeting.

Faculty meetings begin at 4 p.m. At last week's meeting, the first major vote was not cast until 5:30.

Philosophy professor Laszlo Versenyi strongly opposed the approval of increased distribution requirements. (Hazen)

Contract majors pursue interdisciplinary studies

by Beth Broadrup

You open a recent Williams yearbook to the senior pages. You scan the captions under the pictures: "History major...economics major...English-art history major...contract major...." Contract major? It happened to Eric Wilson '87, and he immediately thought, "A generic contract major? What's that?"

Contract majors are not a subversive underground group of academic heretics. They are students who found that none of Williams' established majors fit their interests and decided to create their own major under the amorphous name, "contract major."

Tailor-made

Assistant Dean of the College Joan Edwards, who heads the contract major program, said the classes of 1987, 1988 and 1989 each have seven contract majors. These tailor-made majors are diverse, ranging from the fairly standard asian studies and neuroscience majors to architecture, medieval studies, and peace studies. Asian studies majors have comprised a large percentage of contract majors in past years, but the recent institution of a formal Asian studies departmental major promises to halt that trend.

The contract major takes ten courses from different departments under the guidance of two faculty advisors. The freedom of interdisciplinary work is an obvious plus, but the majoring student faces the problem of existing in a departmental limbo, for he is not part of any one department. Edwards stressed that this situation requires that a contract major be a rather independent person. The student is responsible for designing his major program; Edwards acknowledged that "lots of creativity and hard thinking go into putting together a solid contract major."

Two advisors

On the long road that runs from dazed freshman to graduating contract major, the interested student first goes to the dean's office to informally discuss his possible course of study, fills out an application for the contract major, finds two advisors from the faculty of different departments relating to his topic and picks ten courses leading to the major. His advisors must approve this program. He then must write a brief essay explaining his reasons for pursuing the contract major. The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) reads each application and gives the final ruling.

But what about the people behind the elusive title, the contract majors themselves? Their rewards? Regrets? On the whole, they seem to have had positive experiences. Erol Onel '88, a medical ethics major, cited the individually tailored, specially focused nature of the contract major as one of its main strengths. He also said he values the close contact with his advisors, another advantage of the program: "Williams is a small enough school for students to interact with two advisors and make the major worthwhile."

A musician of true talent

Senior Amy Champagne solos on piano

by Alex Oh

"I was originally planning on going to medical school," said senior Amy Champagne, reflecting upon the ironic turn her career has taken, during an interview conducted after her brilliant concert performance with the Berkshire Symphony two weeks ago Friday. "I had no intentions of majoring in music at all, and I came to Williams because I was looking for a small liberal arts school with a strong science department."

Champagne ended up double-majoring in music and biology, and plans to pursue a graduate degree at the University of Michigan's School of Music after graduation.

When asked if there was any particular reason for her pursuit of music, she replied, "Paula Ennis-Dwyer." Champagne said that the presence of Ennis-Dwyer, a former artist-in-residence and lecturer at Williams, greatly influenced her decision to study music. "I was greatly impressed with her credentials," she said.

Technical prowess

Champagne's performance with the Berkshire Symphony showed she had matured into a musician of true talent and enthusiasm. Her technical prowess on the keyboard was demonstrated during her encore piece last Friday night. The piece, Danza del gaucho matrero, a 20th century composition by Alberto Ginastero, is full of high speed arpeggios and runs which Champagne performed with commanding poise and ease.

Even more noteworthy was her sense of enthusiasm on stage. She exuded excitement and a sense of love for the stage that simply transcended the music. She looked and felt like a natural in front of the keyboard, and it was quite exciting to witness the rising young artist at her best.

"Artsbreaks"

"It was a great experience," Champagne said wistfully, both of her stay here at Williams and of her performance with the Berkshire Symphony. One can almost sense a feeling of sadness in her already as she looks ahead to graduation. For those who missed last Friday night's performance, she has a few more concerts planned for the upcoming weeks.

Champagne will perform at the Clark Art Institute in the "Artsbreaks" concert series, held in the museum's galleries, tomorrow at 12:15 p.m. and on Sunday, May 10, at 2:30 p.m. Among other pieces, she will be playing Brahms' Rhapsody in B minor. After Artsbreaks, Champagne will perform her final Senior Recital May 16 in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

Pianist Amy Champagne will perform at the Clark Art Institute tomorrow and Sunday, May 10.

Princeton

The editors of Business Today, a Princeton student publication with a national circulation of 200,000, admitted last week that some of the 'Letters to the Editor' printed in recent issues and attributed to students at other universities were actually written by the magazine's staff.

According to Editor-in-Chief Wendy Kopp '89, Business Today staff members would write a letter and then read it to another student and ask if they could use that student's name. According to the Daily Princetonian, however, at least one student did not know that his name was going to be used in the magazine, and other students who did approve the use of their names did not know the content of the letters prior to publication.

"I think it's sneaky. I really disapprove of the way they did it," said Peter Greeves, a junior at the University of Maryland whose name appeared below a letter about South Africa.

"I think it's unethical to make something up and stick a name on it," said former Business Today publisher David Frank '88. The Daily Princetonian found that at least six of 15 letters to the editor in two Business Today issues were not written by the students whose names appeared below them. Business Today is distributed to Williams students' S.U. boxes.

Dartmouth

Measles cramped the style of 18 Dartmouth students last weekend, bringing fever and rash to the warm New Hampshire weather. The outbreak, which caused a shortage of beds in the college's infirmary, was described as "disturbing" by Dartmouth's Director of Health Services, Dr. John Turco. "It was thought that you could not have an outbreak within a group of people that were well immunized," he said. The Health Service is presently trying to track down approximately 20 students whose medical records do not indicate whether or not they have been immunized.

Wesleyan

Over 150 Wesleyan students gathered outside the campus' Downey House last Saturday in order to mount a protest against the school's South African investment policy. Inside the house, Wesleyan's trustees were holding a luncheon meeting. The protesters chanted, beat drums, and made a commotion, but the afternoon passed peacefully, with students giving Public Safety officers no reason to take disciplinary action. The protest, which attracted more students than any rally this year, represented a "new movement with new people coming up from the bottom," according to a Wesleyan Student Assembly member.

Worcester Polytechnic Institute

If you're looking for a car, Worcester might be the place for you. The Worcester performing arts group MASQUE is giving away a car to the student who sees the most MASQUE performances during their spring theatre week. The automobile is rumored to be drivable but the running condition is not guaranteed.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled and reported by Record reporters Eric Burns and Anne O'Malley from material printed in campus newspapers.

Onel pointed to the freedom to take interdepartmental courses for major credit as one of the program's best features. He created his major with courses in a range of departments, including religion, philosophy, biology, anthropology, chemistry and political science.

Shannon Penick '89, a pre-med student, decided on a contract major in neuroscience instead of the alternative, a double major in biology and psychology. She can thus take ten relevant courses in place of having to fulfill psychology requirements unrelated to her interest, she explained.

Penick will take chemistry, biology and psychology courses; she noted that some neuroscience majors also work in philosophy, since requirements are quite flexible.

Eric Wilson '87, "the last of the breed" as he calls himself, is an Asian studies contract major who incorporated economics, religion, Chinese, anthropology and history courses into his program.

Disadvantages

While all three students recommended the program, they also noted its disadvantages. Onel cautioned that a coherent, well thought-out major is essential, for "a poorly designed one is a demerit to a liberal arts education." The students also said that some advisors automatically expect a contract major to write a thesis. Wilson said that he felt "like I missed out on something, some of the discipline of a 301 course" that regular majors take.

The most common disadvantage the majors addressed is the sense of not belonging to any department. Penick said that "some professors seem to view you a little unusually" or may even "think you are going soft of them."

Students may find being stuck between departments unpleasant; they are given no preference in course selection, and they cannot attend events for departmental majors. Onel said he missed not being able to discuss his work with others of the same major, but continually explaining his program to people who did not know what he was doing has made him analyze it more.

the last eight or nine years I've been ranked in the top ten in the ameteur New England Men's over 35 division. This year I'm headed for the 45's and I feel I can be (ranked) one or two because I've beaten everybody in the division.

How was your experience coaching professional tennis player Chris Mayotte, older brother of present tennis star, Tim Mayotte?

Although it was not in any way financially rewarding, it was a great experience ... It was a chance to, in effect, laboratory test my feelings about coaching and theories that I developed to see if I was on the right track... I worked with Chris just as I worked with anyone on the teams. Chris was very receptive and appreciative ... and that just gave me a tremendous amount of confidence back at the college level.

Could you elaborate on your experiences as head referee at the Stratton Volvo Tennis Open?

Its a chance to be involved professionally at the highest level of tennis ... I take pride in the tournament running smoothly and the players have acknowledged it as their favorite tournament in the world a couple of times ... As a referee I'm supposed to step in and settle disputes the umpire can't settle ... I've had a little head to head with Lendl and McEnroe ... It is a little disturbing, but as a professional I keep my distance from them and just do my job ... and they respect me and my decisions, although they may not always agree with them.

Which sport do you prefer to coach, tennis or squash? And is there a difference between caoching women as opposed to men?

I really like coaching both sports but I don't think I would like either sport by itself ... It keeps me refreshed and invigorated for each new season ... As far as the men and the women, I find it continually fascinating to coach women as opposed to men because I think there is a big difference between the sexes and how they approach life and tennis ... I think I can anticipate the men pretty well. And the women, I'm still learning a lot.

Besides your new dog, what do you really enjoy in your life? (Sloane has brought his new puppie to every match this year except the tennis team's ione loss against Amherst)

Besides my dog ... well the dog is important and a lot of fun ... tennis and squash ... living life well ... I enjoy the opportunities that the college gives me to travel and I enjoy being in an academic environment ... I have a masters and a doctorate and I enjoy being around people who are involved in studies. Of course, some of my athletes are less involved in studying than others.

Do academics have a role in your philosophy of coaching?

I enjoy the fact that when we are on trips we can talk about things other than tennis and squash ... we can make analogies and allusions to academic matters, to poems, to books, and I think that people learn best when they have a broader perspective on life.

Do you ever think of coaching at a higher level of tennis?

I don't aspire to coach any team higher than Division III athletics ... Because I think that the scholarships and recruiting are ridiculous in an academic environment. Division III is exactly the way it should be. Students should not go to a college to play tennis. They should go to college for the college.

What do you attribute your men's tennis teams' successes in recent years at the NESCAC's? (The team won in '85 and this year)

If you look closely, in both cases, we won the tournament without tremendous achievement in singles. In both cases we swept the doubles ... We work hard on our doubles ... its a fun part of tennis because its teamwork ... I think that we play better doubles than anyone in the conference, and that's why we win.

What do you see in store for yourself in the next five or ten years?

I like to enjoy life and live it to the fullest. I am at a point where I am starting to look back and forward and say what have I done and what can I do. I'm a little more philosophical about that. I don't have anything specific in mind but I'm beginning to question what I want to do ... time will tell.

dentiality should not be respected in the case of AIDS patients.

College Chaplain Carol Pepper said a similar trend of conservatism is affecting Christianity, and she distanced herself from it. "I don't want to be a minister if that means I can't be here," Pepper said.

Many who spoke at the rally concentrated on the struggles that gays, lesbians and bisexuals face at Williams, and some mentioned victories in those struggles.

Senior Ed Stein said the purpose of the rally was partly to address homophobes, and partly to address those who are questioning their sexuality, but also to unite "those of us who are gay, lesbian or bisexual and who are in some way lonely at Williams.

"It gives us a feeling of community to see people we know, and some we don't know, wearing white shirts," Stein said.

Kerry Batcheider '87 said gays fulfill a unique role on campus. "As gays and lesbians at Williams, we represent question marks," Batchelder said. "But I think that that can be good.

"I like to see us as representing possibility and other ways of being — because we need that at Williams College."

Another speaker, Assistant Professor of Political Science Robert Stiglicz, appealed for attention to the crisis of AIDS in Africa, where 50 million people will die with the discase in five years, according to World Health Organization figures he cited.

"I'm really emotional about this, because I've dedicated ten years of my life to studying crisis and war," Stiglicz said. "The emotions I feel for this are unparalleled."

Malcolm said the attendance at Friday's rally was less than half that of the rally last spring, on the college's first Lesbian and Gay Awareness Day.

"I'm saddened that it was a small turnout," he said after the rally. Malcolm said that he had hoped many more people would attend who were not affiliated with the BGLU.

He said the rally will be an annual event.

Eisenberg predicts increased violence, unrest in S. Africa

by Paul Kwon

"I see a long, long struggle ahead in South Africa," said Neville Eisenberg during his lecutre on Tuesday, April 28. Although the lecture was titled "Jews in South Africa," the lecture dealt mainly with the general problems of Apartheid and racism in South Africa.

Eisenberg, former national chairperson of the South African Union of Jewish Students, described the violence in South Africa, saying, "There is violence in South Africa, and an equilibrium of violence. The question is whether this can be stopped in time before the entire country is destroyed."

He said that the country's survival hinges on whether the blacks and the whites can narrow their gaps of perception. The blacks want a complete change of the system that would bring them individual rights and one vote for every man, he said, while the whites are willing to concede only a reform of the system, a system of group rights, and are unwilling to grant one vote for every man.

Eisenberg said, "The government hasn't even unleashed a fraction of their firepower. The blacks haven't unleashed all of their power either. I think the time's coming when the government will soon unleash their power. They have the strongest army on the continent and could withstand simultaneous attacks from neighboring countries."

He concluded, "The government will use everything at their disposal to withstand protests inside and outside the country."

On the subject of government oppression, Eisenberg noted an important difference in the ways the government affects blacks and whites. "The South African government absolutely controls every aspect of the blacks' lives - the way they live, the food they eat, the education they receive - all these things are completely affected by apartheid and religious discrimination," he said.

Under South Africa law, Eisenberg is prohibited to support divestment. On the benefits of divestment policy, he said, "Before sanctions, the South African government could dismiss foreign governments' protests as hypocritical rhetoric since their country's companies were in South Africa. With divestment, this has finally been changed."

He also noted several problems with divestment. "Obviously, divestment is not supported by blacks in South Africa. They think that blacks will be the first to suffer. I think this is a myth."

the team won five of six singles matches in crushing Trinity on the road by a 7-2 score. Then, two days after capturing the crown, the team downed a visiting Albany State team 6-3.

On Saturday, against Wesleyan, the Ephs fed the Cardinals some home cooking as the dominated the Redbirds by a 6-3 score, raising the team record to 7-1. Sloane's reactions to the match were mixed. He was pleased that it was a competitive match, but believed that the matches did not reflect the true potential abilities of the Williams players.

In the match, Caltabiano continued his torrid streak with a 6-3, 6-1 win at the number five position. The third doubles team of Friend and Hunt chalked up another 'three and one' win and Luddington trounced his opponent, giving away only three games in a straight set victory. Callanan and Sawyer each had tough three set losses at the top two singles positions. Said Guy Cohen, Wesleyan's number one, "(They) were the type of matches where it is a shame someone has to win."

This week the team hosts Union College Thursday before it travels to Beantown to play M.I.T.on Saturday.

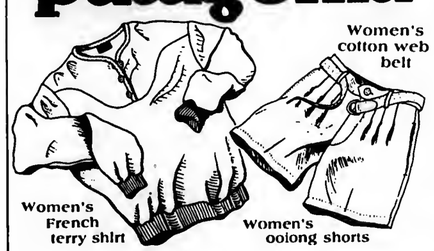
word. When an individual tells me that I am sinning that immediately sets up a hierarchy, with him above me. As a person who questions the meaning of true sin, I object to this subjective determination of sin and order. Besides, "How can you say to your brother,'Let me take that speck out of your eye,' while all the time the plank remains in yourt own?" (Matthew, 7:4).



I am glad that the attempt to remove sin from sinner is mentioned. It is something that too few, myself included, do. However, when you presume to inform someone of the wrongness of their actions, you, under the pretense of being honest, simply note what is wrong for you. Unless a person should come to another in penitence, then perhaps one should consider more tolerance of secular society. It is funny that the editor gave Mr. Nalr's article the title of "the need to tolerate the beliefs of others." Indeed, that is what we should all do.

Froburg places fifth

R.P.I. hosts cyclists

On April 26th the Eastern Collegiate Cycling Federation Road Championships were hosted by Renssalaer Polytechnic Institute The route coursed through an upstate farming community and presented hill after hill to the more than 250 racers who turned out.

As the steep grades may have demoralized some competitors, freshman Kirsten Froburg took advantage of her climbing ability to go on a breakaway. Midway through the 27-mile women's race, Froburg and four other riders attacked and pulled ahead with a two-minute lead. When it came down to the finish, the riders from the University of Massachusetts, Cornell, and Army managed to outkick the Ephwomen, who came in fifth.

It was a superb performance for Froburg, who needs only to improve her final sprint in order to start winning races. Loyal Molly O'Bourn '89, who finished twelfth overall, worked to protect her teammate's lead by keeping with the chase pack and slowing it at every opportunity.

The day was disappointing for the men. In the B race juniors Paul Danielson and Michael Weber stuck to the rear of the congested pack and failed to make a combined move before the 36-mile race came to an end. Senior Ted Lohr lead a contingent of Williams riders including Peter English '88, Dirk Bergstrom '89, Mark Reid '89 and Matt McQueen '89 to a respectable finish in the C race. Retiring early were Tom Fitzgibbon '87 with cramps and Mike Grow '90 with wheel trouble.

record in the triple jump (set the previous week at Amherst). The women's team excelled in the relays, and came away with a victory in the meet. The 4x400 team of Susan Gray '90, Jen Morris '89, Ann Dannhauer '90, and Dawn Macauley '90 set a school record with a time of 4:04. The 4x800 relay team of Gray, Dannhauer, Morris, and Becky Conklin '87 duplicated the feat of the 4x400 with a time of 9:32.25. In addition, the sprint medley posted a victory, while the distance medley and 4x100 meter relay teams took second.

Karlyn McNall '90 set a meet record in the long jump with a leap of 16'3", while Macauley posted a victory in the 400 meter hurdles, as she tunes up for nationals in the event.

The men's team will be competing at W.P.I. again this weekend as they attempt to fulfill their season long quest for the New England Championship, while the women run in the ECAC's at Bowdoin.

In the second half, the Ephs came out pumped up and scored a point when Chris Jones '88 threw a hammer pass into the endzone. It appeared that the pass would be sucked down by the wind when Daryl Walsh '87 made a sliding dive to catch the disk one-handed. From then on, WUFO surged to outscore UVM, but the effort fell short in a 13-11 loss.

The second game, against Linden State, was a complete mismatch of WUFO saved its legs in a 13-6 breeze of a win. Captain Jones psyched up the team for the UMass game after having decided to forfeit one match to return to Spring Weekend parties. After exchanging points, WUFO recieved a throwoff, and Tom Ewing '87 and Jones handled the disc up the field. At about midfield, Jones snapped off a forehand to the endzone where John Schafer '87 yanked it down for a score.

Then, leading 4-2, WUFO switched from a man-to-man to a zone defense, and UMass was shut down, repeatedly being pushed back to their endzone. WUFO was able to score against the wind, as Jones hit Schafer, John Beilwoar '89 and Mark Via '87 for tallies. The final score of the game: WUFO 13, former national champs 3.

followed with a goal of her own as she drove through a crowd of Amherst defenders with a superior individual effort. Beth Bernheimer '88 and Amy Kershaw '90 added two more for Williams, but Amherst scored twice to narrow the Eph lead to 5-4 at the half.

Second half explosion

The Ephs continued their strong second half tradition in this all-important game, scoring the first three goals of the half and outscoring the beleaguered Jeffs 8-3 in the second stanza. Flaherty again led the Williams offense, scoring three of her four goals, and Mara Burnett '88 added two more.

Amherst never got a chance to get any momentum in their offense as tenacious defense and superior goaltending by Martha Hoopes '87 thwarted their every opportunity. The game could have been a laugher without the great efforts of the Amherst goalie and the Ephs' inability to capitalize on a number of near misses.

The victory posts the team's record at 5-4 following a 12-9 loss at Middlebury last week. The squad will face Union away on Thursday.

JV 8 men wins crew meet in Connecticut

by Chuck Samuelson

The men's JV heavyweight eight came away with Williams' only win on Saturday in a regatta against Trinity, Ithaca, and Marist at Lake Waramaug, Connecticut. All the boats must come back strongly in order to perform well at the Dad Vail Championships in Philadelphia next week.

The freshmen lightweight eight came in second on the 1850-meter course, behind Trinity and ahead of Union. "They rowed a good race for them and it was good to see them beat Union," coach Peter Wells said of their performance. The freshmen heaveyweight eight, however, was a different story. Their third place finish behind Trinity and Ithaca prompted Wells to say, "It's upseting they haven't really pushed up additional boat speed as the year has worn on."

Men's varsity falls

The varsity heavyweight eight was also a disappointment. "I knew it was going to be an extremely close race," said Wells. Indeed, all the boats were within two or three seats after the first 1000 meters. Trinity, however, pulled ahead and rowed a very strong finish, with a time of 6:05.7. Williams, in the words of Wells, "just didn't have it for the second 1000." The Ephs could not hold off a final Union surge and finished fourth in 6:14.5.

The race bore out each crew's ranking before the race. Trinity was ranked number two in New England and beat number four Union and number five Williams. Wells said that poor weather last week prevented the team from getting in a good week of practice. He is looking for better conditions this week so his team can make up the nine seconds they lost to Trinity.

Wells has nothing but kind words for the JV heavyweight eight (4-5), ,who beat Union by nearly five seconds with a 6:39.4. "I was happy for the JV's ... it was nice to see them win because they've been working very hard."

In other races, the varsity women's eight came in second behind Trinity and ahead of Ithaca and Union, and the novice women's eight came in third behind Ithaca and Trinity and ahead of Union.

ision III winner, Salem State.

Weather problems

Coach Pohle believes the weather was a factor in the team's mediocre: "Since the weather was the same for all teams, I can't really use it as an excuse for shooting poorly," he said, "but when we get off to a bad start and had some breaks go against us, the poor conditions seemed to add to the player frustrations."

The squad had an opportunity for improvement Sunday and Monday as Williams played host to the New England Small College Athletic Conference. Results were not available at press time.

After the NESCAC's, the team is scheduled to travel to Amherst for the Little Three meet Wednesday.

National champs defeated by Jones — led WUFO 13-3

by Hans Humes

Williams' Ultimate Frisbee made it to the College Regionals last weekend with a convincing win over Linden State and a 13-3 humiliation of the reigning collegiate ultimate champion, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

WUFO went to sectionals this weekend a bit apprehensive. The team had played some of the worst frisbee of its history, losing six of seven games. Moreover, due to strict eligibility rules, four starters, including two professors, had to stay at home.

WUFO's first game was against the number-one sectionally ranked University of Vermont. The first half was marked by fine play by UVM and extreme nervousness by WUFO. Time and time again, the handlers worked the frisbee the length of the field only to let nerves cause an endzone turnover. The score stood 7-4 UVM at the end of the half.

Tough foes down laxmen

by Marc McDermott

Despite the loss of scoring leader Mike O'Connell '87 to a concussion suffered in the first period, and a season-long tendency to let the close ones slip away, the men's lacrosse team seemed in control of its Little Three title match with Amherst on Saturday at Cole Field. At first, the Ephs dominated the Lord Jeffs, the number one team in New England, as they flew twice as many shots on goal to take a 5-4 halftime lead.

Trailing 2-0, the Ephs rallied with three of their own with two tallies from O'Connell and junior Bill Boyd, before the team's big guns, O'Connell and freshman Bobby Santry linked to put Williams ahead 3-2 on Santry's rocket with 5:59 remaining in the first period. After two Amherst scores, the rest of the half belonged to the Ephs as they exhibited great stickhandling and a swarming defense while keeping the ball in Amherst's zone nearly the entire time.

Amherst showed why it was ranked number one only three minutes into the third quarter, stunning the Ephs with two goals in a twenty second span. Coach Renzie Lamb called time to halt the momentum, but the damage had been done and the Jeffs led 6-5.

"Didn't capitalize"

The rest of the game was a replay of the second period as the Ephmen fired away for the last twenty-eight minutes with nothing to show for it. "Our strategy was to score the goals and then hold on. We held them, but we just couldn't come up with the score," said a disappointed Lamb after the game. "We had our opportunities but didn't capitalize, even though the defense played a great game," he said.

Senior captain Taylor Watts was more optimistic than Lamb: "Its always an emotional game when we play Amherst and it showed out there. We rose to the occasion and played a great game. Amherst is number one but we'll get them in the (East Coast Athletic Conference) tournament," said Watts.

With the loss, Williams drops to 4-4 although it still holds the fifth position in the New England Division III poll. The team's chances for qualifying for the ECAC tournament are diminished as it lost to the region's number two team, Middlebury earlier in the week.

In that contest, Williams held the Panthers scoreless for thirteen minutes on a rain-drenched field before falling behind 7-3 at the half. The Ephs fought back to 8-6 before tumbling to a 17-8 loss. Both O'Connell and Santry had two goals and a pair of assists in the loss. Lamb expressed his disappointment saying, "We played for two and a half quarters against Middlebury and then just stopped playing."

Williams concludes its regular season play this week with a home game against Connecticut College Thursday and an away match at Hamilton Saturday.

Spotlight on Sean Sloane

by Jonathan Hollenberg

Sean Sloane, tennis coach at Williams since 1971 and eventual squash coach, adds a great deal more to the community than his instructional expertise. A modest, humble and restrained personality who has risen to the top of the United States Professional Tennis Association Administrative ladder, Sloane has coached on both a personal and team level, written articles for prominent tennis magazines, and headed operations and refereeing responsibilities for tournaments on the Volvo Grand Prix circuit. In 1986 he was named the USPTA Professional of the Year. These are the excerpts of an interview the Record conducted with Sloane.

RECORD: Your involvement in the sport of tennis is much deeper due to your association with the USPTA. Could you describe your role in this body and its relevance to your activities at Williams?

SLOANE: The USPTA actually helped me get my job at Williams ... Through my involvement in the association I met other teaching pros who coached at the college level and urged me to look into the job opening at Williams ... I am currently the First Vice-President in line to be President in another year or so ... My role in the association has taken up a lot of time. So far I think I've managed to achieve a pretty good balance between my responsibilities to the association and my job at Williams.

You have been ranked nationally as a player among other teaching pros in the USPTA. How seriously are you with your personal play?

I do take it pretty seriously during the summer. I practice about twice a day and I go to a number of tournaments ... For

WPI Relays prep track teams for weekend

by Steve Brody

While some of the men's track team ran against the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (M.I.T.) on Friday, certain members of both the men's and women's teams ran in the Worcester Polytechnic Institute (W.P.I.) Relays. Although the men were defeated by M.I.T., they ran without a full team, and expect to finish in front of the Techsters at the New England Division III Championships next weekend. The meet showed that the team's top performers will be in prime form as the season winds to a finish with several big upcoming meets.

Brandt Johnson '87 leapt 6'10" in the high jump to win the event and qualify for Divsion III nationals. The senior is one of the favorites for the New England meet. Another field event performer showing prime form was Ken Alleyne '88, soaring to a distance of 22'4" in the long jump, while Henry Jones '88 reached a season best 22'0" to take second. Jones also captured second in the triple jump at 45'7".

The Ephs took 1-2-3 in both the 100 and 200 meter dashes. Pierre Swart '90, Kevin McKnight '88, and Lars Hem '90 swept the 100, while Swart, Andre Lopez '87, and Scott Powers '88 took the 200. Other top performances included the mile relay team's victory in 3:22 and PR's by both Jim Simmonds '89 (2:03.9) and Juan Aponte '89 (2:02.5) in the 800 meters.

Golf falls short at Cape; Frechette to Nationals

by Ted Ruger

Hampered by typical blustery Cape Cod weather, the golf team struggled to a disappointing sixteenth place finish in the New England Championships last week. Although their finish placed the squad ahead of a majority of the 42 teams competing in the tourney, Coach Rick Pohle had expressed hopes for a stronger effort by the Ephs prior to the tournament.

A bright spot for the Williams team was the performance of Tim Frechette '89, whose fifteenth place finish, combined with his strong record in the fall, earned him a trip to the Division III National Championship in Delaware, Ohio, later this month. Frechette's two-day total was 162.

Mike Harrington '88, Guy Kurtz '87, Tim McKone '87 and Ian Lapey '89 were the other members of the traveling squad. The Ephs' score at the end of the tournament stood at 683, with the highest score of the five being dropped. The Division I University of Hartford team captured first place overall, six strokes ahead of the Div-

Spring means golf, and golf this year means the Friday Afternoon Golf League. Last week's event was four-man scramble format, and the team of Ian Heitmeuller, Alec Dawson, Mark Raisbeck and John Booth won a sudden-death playoff with the squad of Ted Hobart Bill Zox, Dave Montgomery and Willie Morris when Heitmeuller hit 5-iron on 9 to within 7 feet. When Raisbeck sank the 2nd attempt at the putt, the title was theirs.

The highlight of the round was Hobart's drive on the par-4 3rd hole, which rolled to within 4 feet of the temporary hole for a tap-in eagle.

Two weeks ago, the team of Charlie Hufford and Montgomery won the two-man combined score at 94, three shots ahead of Rob Ward and Stu Verdery.

Laxwomen maul Jeffs for Little Three crown

by Ted Hobart

Saturday afternoon looked like it might be a long one for the women's lacrosse team as the despised Lord Jeffs of Amherst scored the first two goals of the day to jump out to a quick lead. The Ephs were undaunted, however, as their potent offense came alive to turn the tables on Amherst and post a 13-6 victory to clinch the Little Three Championship.

Amherst seemed very well prepared to face the Williams attack, as the Jeffs packed their defensive zone to slow down the more talented Ephs. It did not take long, however, for the team to adapt its strategy to counter the slowdown game of Amherst. Coach Chris Mason commented, "We got out of our end on the fast break very well, before they could get back. And when the offense set up in their end, the attack was much more patient."

Katie Hogan '87 put the Ephs on the board from a free position quickly after Amherst's two goals. The next goal seemed to signify that the Ephs had really come to life as co-captain Lee Wierdsma '87 fed a sweet pass from behind the net to Mo Flaherty '88, who received the ball and and shot in one motion to beat the Jeff goalie. Doubles key NESCAC tourney win

by Mary Kipp and Julie Jacobson

Last week the men's tennis team captured the New England Small College Athletic Conference Championship in improbable fashion at Amherst. The win, by a mere half point over Connecticut College, marked yet another highpoint in what is becoming one of the more successful tennis seasons in recent memory.

As has been the trademark for the team all year, doubles proved to be the deciding factor as the team captured all three flights en route to the title. In the NESCAC's, there are six flights of play: three doubles and three singles. However, despite eventually capturing four of the six flights (Marc Caltabiano won the 5-6 singles flight), the Ephs were not confident of winning it all after Saturday's play. Said number two singles and number one doubles player Drew Sawyer '89, "We didn't believe it when (Coach Sean Sloane) said we still had a chance to win the title in doubles. We thought his math was wrong."

Sloane's math correct

However, Sloane proved to be the better mathematician as the squad rallied past Connecticut College, which only had to win two of its final six matches to capture the title. The furious rally commenced when captain Kevin Callanan '87 teamed with Sawyer to win the doubles number one flight over Tufts University in three sets. Tufts, the only team that had previously beaten the Ephs number one duo, had its serve broken in the third set to lose the match. The win also was critical for Sawyer and Callanan for it provided them a national ranking of 17th and probably will give them a shot at playing in the nationals later in the month.

Other winners in doubles were Hoyt Luddington '88 and Caltabiano at number two, and Pier Friend '88 and Brad Hunt '90 at number three. The most amazing story of the tournament, despite Sawyer and Callanan's ascendence to national prominence, is Caltabiano. The confident freshman won both his singles and double flights without ever dropping a set. Without his performance, the Ephs would not have come close to regaining the title they last owned in 1985.

The week before NESCAC's,

Softball brooms Amherst in twinbill

by Chris Adams

Following a rainout during the week against Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, the women's softball team swept a pair of games with Wesleyan, raising its record to 5-3. In their first appearance since last week's doubleheader against Trinity, the Ephs got off to a fine start winning the first game 6-2.

The Ephs used a single by Missy Crouchley '89, a walk to Kathleen Oehling '87, a single by Tory Ballard '87 and a sacrifice by third baseman Wendy Roy '88. The senior co-captains Oehling and Ballard continued their solid play, combining for five hits, two walks, and three runs.

The defense combined with a complete game, six strikeout performance by Nancy Hedeman '89 to hold the Cardinals to two unearned runs. At the other end of the battery, catcher Emily Donovan '90 had a solid game with three assists and six putouts. The Ephs added two more runs in the third inning and iced the victory with one in the fifth and two in the sixth by shortstop Lori Schaen '89 and rightfielder Christina Schnabel '87.

"It's a long ride home"

The second game featured 14 Williams hits leading to 14 runs as the Ephs rocked the Cardinals 14-8. All eight Wesleyan runs were unearned as Hedeman pitched a solid game to complete a full 14 innings of work. Schaen and Hedeman both pounded out three hits as the Ephs scored four in the second, two in the third and five in the fifth to be in fine shape as they faced a four-run Wesleyan rally in the seventh inning. Wesleyan had started well with four runs in the second, but the Ephwomen roared back in the bottom of the inning.

The rally started with a walks to Roy and designated hitter Anne Petersen '89 sandwiched around a single by Schaen and was finished off with a barrage of hits by Hedeman, Oehling and Crouchley.

The 5-3 Ephs look to live up to their record this week with a home and home series with North Adams State, away today and home on Saturday.

Amherst sweeps, 6-1, 13-2

by Stewart Verdery

"It was a day to forget," said pitching coach Carl Boetze after the baseball team was swept Saturday by Amherst, 6-1 and 13-2. The losses dropped the Ephs' record to 6-6 up north and 7-13 overall. Their Little Three chances now hinge on three games against Wesleyan.

In the opener, Williams fell behind 1-0 on a Paul Foye RBI single for Amherst off Eph hurler Mike Barbera '89 (2-2). Williams could never make up the margin despite a gutty performance from Barbera, who held the Jeffs to three runs without his best stuff. With Amherst up 2-0 in the fourth, Steve Belsito '87 doubled home Rick Hedeman '87, who bowled over the Jeff catcher at the plate as Williams scored their only run against Jeff starter Carmen Monks.

In the fifth, Barbera was forced from the game after Amherst bunched three two-out singles for a run. Down 3-1, the Ephs mounted one last effort in the bottom of the sixth of the shortened seven-inning game. Belsito walked and Scott Kennedy '89 (now hitting .404) and John Shaw '87 singled to load the bases with one out. But .392-hitting Jim Duquette's two-out fly ball to left was held up in the wind enough to be caught short of the fence to end the inning. Amherst got three more in the seventh, and the final margin stood at 6-1.

Amherst takes season series

Amherst struck early and often in the second game, picking up two in the first, two in the second and four in the third. Meanwhile, Williams did not scratch a hit until a Chris Donato '89 (six hits in his last eight at bats) single in the fourth. Williams finally got two in the sixth, but four Jeffs touched home in the seventh on a grand slam to make the final score 13-2. One bright spot was the work of freshman pitcher Billy Schwartz, who threw two innings of scoreless ball in his Eph debut.

Earlier in the week, the Ephs beat Middlebury 6-3 and lost to American International College 13-6. In the Middlebury game, Rob Bianck '89 and Scott Garfield '88 combined on a five-hitter and the Ephs scored three times in the eighth to break a 3-3 tie. Belsito's double scored Hedeman (hitting .480 and holder of 12-game hitting streak) with the game-winner, and Kennedy and Shaw knocked in insurance runs.

The A.I.C. contest was never close as the Bees jumped out to a 8-0 lead after two innings. One item of interest was Hedeman, who hit safely his first three times up to stretch his streak of consecutive hits to seven before grounding out in the seventh.

The Ephs played North Adams State today and host Union Thursday before heading to Wesleyan Saturday for a doubleheader. Monday, the Cardinals will come to Williamstown with the Little Three standings in the balance.

Third baseman Chris Pachus '88 makes contact in Saturday's home doubleheader loss to Amherst. The sweep puts the team's chances for a Little Three title in extreme doubt. (Lebauer)

Oakley sets up Commission on Campus Race Relations

by Karen Costenbader

College President Oakley announced the establishment of a Commission on Campus Race Relations in a letter to the Williams community yesterday.

"The Commission will be charged in general with the responsibility for monitoring race relations at Williams, making recommendations for their improvement, and arranging activities and events designed to promote racial understanding at the College," he said in the letter.

This announcement follows the demand for the formation of a grievance committee, one of the five immediate demands enumerated in the February 12 letter from the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) to the administration. Since then, President Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix have met several times with the WBSU members, as well as separately with its coordinators.

"I affirmed that during the weeks to come Dean Fix and I would be working with students, faculty and staff to clarify the dimensions of the problems involved and to respond to the

Assailant unidentified

Man attacks female student on Stetson Rd.

by Debbie Snyder

A female freshman was attacked on Stetson Road as she was walking back from the Mission Park parking lot last Tuesday night, May 5. The assailant hit the student and knocked her to the ground, but ran when she fought back.

The student went to an apartment on Stetson Road, and the occupant called security, Director of Security Ransom Jenks said. Security also received a phone call from a student in Mission Park, who heard screaming, Jenks said. Security called the Williamstown Police, who are now conducting a search for the assailant.

Assistance

"There was a lot of assistance that her screaming brought to her aid, which is gratifying," Jenks said. "It's good to know that if you scream loud enough, someone will hear you and will call.

The student sustained facial injuries around her eyes, but she is not seriously hurt, according to Dean of the College Stephen Fix.

The assailant is described by a police composite sketch as a white male, late teens to early twenties, 5'10" tall, 160-170 pounds, with long brown hair, a muscular build and clean shaven. He was wearing a denim jacket, brown pants and a white T-shirt.

Williams Student?

In a letter to the Williams Community on Wednesday, May 6, Fix said, "The student, the College, and the local police strongly believe that the assailant was not a Williams student." Fix declined to comment on why they hold this belief.

"You look at the picture and tell me it's not a college student," Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zoito said. He said the description of the assailant could fit either a Williams student or someone else, and that he does not necessarily believe that the assailant was not a Williams student.

Jenks and Zoito said that security patrols by security and by police have been increased in the area since the attack. Fix in his letter encouraged the use of security's escort service by all members of the college community. Security received 8 requests for escorts on Wednesday night, which Jenks said is more than usual.

Driver who hit Krouse acquitted on Thursday

by Jocelyn Shadforth

A jury Thursday acquitted Mark H. Miller, 31, of Vermont, of charges of vehicular homicide in the death last September of Richard W. Krouse, who was an associate professor of political science at Williams. A not-guilty verdict was also returned in the lesser criminal charge of operating to endanger and the civil charge of failure to keep left of a vehicle travelling in the same direction.

The trial, held in the District Court of Appeals in Pittsfield, lasted four days and was attended by members of the political science and economics departments.

Miller told the six-member jury that he did not cross lanes, but rather pulled left to avoid hitting another car that had swerved to avoid Krouse's car which was situated sideways in the middle of the road, the Berkshire Eagle reported.

Assistant District Attorney Gerard D. Downing said in his closing arguments that the evidence did not support Miller's testimony, the Eagle reported. Downing argued that the force of the collision, as well as witnesses' testimony, demonstrated that Miller was passing the cars and not decelerating in order to avoid a collision.

Defense attorney Robert J. Bray of Greenfield, in his summation, cited a lack of supporting evidence as grounds for an acquittal. During the trial, Bray also made a motion for a mistrial when two supplementary witness statements, taken by the Williamstown Police Department, were not furnished to the prosecution or the defense. The motion was denied by Judge Robert J. Donelan.

"Justice wasn't done"

Political science department chairman Gary Jacobsohn, who attended most of the trial, said he was angered and saddened by the verdict. "Dick Krouse was a person who's passion was justice. I was struck by the perverse irony of the result in the context of a person so identified with justice. Translation: Justice wasn't done," he said.

"As the trial proceeded, however, I wasn't shocked by the verdict," Jacobsohn said. He cited problems with the work of the Williamstown Police Department and the nature of their investigation as contributing to the lack of evidence in the trial.

Jacobsohn also said that the jury was not familiar with the geography of Cole Avenue and, as a result, did not realize that Miller's recount of the accident was improbable.

During the trial, questions were also raised as to the completeness of the police investigation. Bray said that the police did not take complete measurements at the scene of the accident, failed to

Bolin Fellows announced for next year

by Peter Balaban

The recipients of the Gaius Charles Bolin Fellowships for next year will be Shanti Marie Assefa and Rafia Zafar. The fellowship program, named in honor of William's first black graduate, is now finishing up its first year. The fellowship allows minority graduate students to work on their dissertations and teach a one-semester course at Williams.

Assefa, who is working on her Ph.D. in History at Princeton, received her B.A. from Swarthmore College. She will teach in the History department next year. Her dissertation subject is "A Conspiracy of Twenty Million Frenchmen: Public Opinion and Popular Protest During the Maupeou Revolution, 1770-1774." She has special interests in Comparitive Early Modern France and England, Medieval Europe, and 19th Century France.

Zafar, a graduate of City College of New York, is working on her Ph.D in American Civilization at Harvard. She will teach in the English department next year. Her dissertation subject is "Black and White and Read All Over: Recontextualizing American Literature from the Early National Era to the age of Abolition.

Dean of the Faculty John Reichert said he thought the first year of the program has been successful. "I think both of them (this year's Fellows) have made a fine contribution to their departments and to the students.

"They've worked well with other faculty," he said. "Instead of just withdrawing into their dissertations and teaching, they got to know people and shared ideas."

Although the current Fellows — Roland Anglin and Wahneema Lubiano — are leaving Williams to teach elsewhere next year, Reichert said he did not view the program as a failure.

He said that the purpose of the fellowship is not to recruit black faculty to Williams but rather to encourage black graduate students to go into teaching by allowing them to complete their dissertations at a point in their careers when funding is hard to get.

"If we end up at some point hiring a Bolin fellow, I think that would be a kind of delightful side effect, and I suspect at some point it will happen," Reichert said.

Lubiano said she decided to turn down the position offered to her in the English department after discovering that her 11 year old son Jefe "had been involved in a number of incidents with racial overtones after school and at the Williamstown Youth Center" in which he had been physically attacked by some other children..

She said that if she did not have to worry about raising her son here, she would have stayed at Williams.

Wahneema Lubiano

"I had not calculated how much this place was homogeneous," Lubiano said. "My thinking was always based on a best case scenario: small liberal community, good school, stable environment."

Lubiano taught "The Modern Afro-American Novel" as part of the fellowship. She said the students who took the course were "very powerful intellectually," but she also said she sensed and had heard from other faculty that "students find it very difficult being unsettled in the classroom."

Lubiano also said that she felt a different attitude toward minorities outside of Williams. "It has been uncomfortable for me some times in some places, but I have no interest on a day to day basis in raising the consciousness of bigots."

Anglin said he thought the fellowship program was successful because it provided an opportunity to work free from

The elusive grievance committee

For those members of the Williams community interested in addressing the problem of campus racial tension, yesterday's letter from President Francis Oakley announcing the formation of a Commission on Campus Race Relations was a disappointment.

Three months ago today, in a letter to Oakley, the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) issued a set of demands, and sought a response from administrators and students to the racial tension evident on campus. Since the public distribution of that letter, the community has wondered just what the administration would say. In particular, the subject of college grievance procedures has risen to considerable prominence in campus debate.

The administration's response, as outlined in yesterday's letter, effectively sidesteps any immediate action on the grievance issue. The commission proposed by Oakley is charged with a large variety of responsibilities, only one of which is the review of grievance procedures.

Indeed, even that review is targeted at the "visibility" of the procedures and "the degree to which they are adequate and helpful in responding to allegations of racial insensitivity."

It does not include substantive change in the procedures themselves. In fact, any chance for creating a grievance committee may be buried in the language and timing of the Oakley's commission announcement.

While publicity of the procedures may be increased, any substantive change in the policy will probably be incremental, designed to mend the image of existing procedures rather than create new ones.

What the administration's response boils down to is an agreement to form a committee to discuss the effectiveness of existing institutional procedures. That is not much concrete action. While administrators may be sincere in their willingness to review the grievance process, they are not listening to students, who argue convincingly that a new committee is absolutely and immediately necessary.

Quotation of the Week

"Dick Krouse was a person who's passion was justice. I was struck by the perverse irony of the result in the context of a person so identified with justice. Translation: Justice wasn't done."

Technical problems on WCFM show were origin of controversy

To the Editor:

As hosts for the WCFM Community Affairs program of April 19, John Basedow and I would like to clear upany misunderstanding about the call-in portion of our show that Glenn Bloom and Martin White referred to in their letters to the editor.

During the live program, due to technical difficulties, we were unable to broadcast callers' comments directly over the air. Because the aim of the show was to give all sides an opportunity to present their opinions, we wanted to find an alternative that would still allow listeners to express their responses to the panelists. The next best option was to have the calls transcribed during the show and then read on the air. Clearly, the situation was not ideal. Exact quotations of the fifteen calls we received during the hour program were impossible.

Because of both a time constraint and a pressure to stick to previously chosen topics, we did not read Glenn Bloom's carefully written, but lengthy clarification of his call on the air.

We apologize for the imperfect conditions and thank Glenn Bloom and Martin White for sharing their opinions with the show's listeners.

A dedication to tolerance must not breed a paralysis of moral strength

To the Editor:

I would like to make a few observations with regard to Brian Watson's response last week to my Op-Ed piece of April 21. This is not my "retaliation" to Brian's article. I thank him for speaking out.

First, in my article I had written, "... it is relevant for us at Williams to consider more carefully the question of 'fundamentalism' ... because a portion of our community leads an active spiritual life ...." I did not mean to imply that only fundamentalists lead active spiritual lives. My point was that the subject I was addressing had relevance even to those members of our community who do not consider the spiritual realm to have direct application to their daily lives.

Second, I cannot agree with the notion of relative morality that Brian posited. I do not want to enter into a theological discussion here (I would be happy to discuss the point in some other forum.). Suffice it to say for now that I continue to consider God to be the source of all righteousness. Brian's arguments that the Bible cannot be used as God's absolute moral instruction for man do not convince me.

However, I do want to respond to Brian's view that it is intolerant to "inform someone of the wrongness of their actions ...." The Biblical verse that Brian quoted (Matthew 7:4) admonishes hypocrisy. I have strongly advocated that it is essential that we search ourselves critically at every opportunity, for none of us is infallible.

There is a danger, however, that we might allow ourselves to lapse into paralysis and allow both "the speck" and "the log" to remain in our eyes. Rather than remain silent ought we not to be challenging others with a readiness to be challenged ourselves?

Further, I will only presume to approach an individual to "tell (him or her) what sins (he or she) is committing ..." if I can do so with love. In most cases such a situation arises only if I have a relationship with the other person. I do not agree that such interaction between people "immediately sets up a hierarchy ...." In my view it is God who is infallible, constant, and sovereign. I, on the other hand, am very much a sinner; one who can only presume to seek and know God by the grace of Jesus Christ. Surely in attempting to aid a fellow traveler I am not establishing a hierarchy but rather trying to actively love my neighbor.

I do not claim to be infallible nor do I claim to have answers to all questions —— none of us can. I do maintain, though, that our limitations do not condemn us to intellectual, moral, and spiritual paralysis.

If by tolerance we mean indifference, I do not want tolerance. Rather, I welcome challenge and criticism. Let us search ourselves and each other for that is the only way we will grow. Brian's criticism of my article was a step in that direction. I thank him for that.

Record fails to cover Gospel Choir in oversight of College arts events

To the Editor:

I would like to respond in strong support of Doug Moore's recent letter concerning the Record's omission of the BSO concert of April 25. I am not surprised at the omission because the Record has consistently ignored major events in the arts here at Williams. I am particularly disconcerted because the Record has rarely reviewed anything that the Gospel Choir has done.

Since its genesis in January 1986, the Choir has boldly stepped out and has performed on many occasions. I point specifically to the following performances because they were not reviewed by the Record.

During the month of February 1986, the Choir was host to the Mt. Calvary Mass Choir of Buffalo, New York, as part of an intercollegiate weekend sponsored by the Williams Black Student Union.

On May 3 of last year, the Choir held its first Spring Concert, having only existed for four months.

Moving to this year, the Choir was very instrumental in getting the gospel choir COMMISSIONED, at the top of the gospel music industry, from Detroit, Michigan, as part of the annual Martin Luther King Memorial Service. The Record, in the few lines allotted for that event, glossed over the Service itself and did not even mention COMMISSIONED. As I read the edition of the Record, which followed the Service, I was shocked.

Now let's analyze the situation. Here we have a group of many different people. We have black members, Asian members, white members, and Hispanic members. I think that's pretty diverse. The group obviously appeals to more than blacks, who have been the patrons of Gospel music. Now, in this community, which pleads for diversity and individuality, why can't a group like the Gospel Choir get the recognition it deserves.

I am not asking for acceptance, because the Gospel Choir is more than confident of its ability. However, I would

Goodbye - Hello

This is the Record's last regular issue for 1986-87. We will publish a graduation issue for seniors and parents on June 7.

With this issue, we bid farewell to sports editor Stu Verdery '89 and assistant news editor Karen Costenbader '89, both of whom will study abroad next year.

We look forward to the return in September of Virginia Demaree '88, who was news editor, and Eric Hanson '88, former features editor, after their experiences in Europe this year.

Best wishes for the summer.

End of Freshman Spring: only three more years at Williams

by Helen Lee '90

Somehow, some way, my freshman year in college sped away without me being quite able to grab it. It's like the feeling you get when you think you've caught an object thrown to you — until it slips from your grasp. Already the end of this long-awaited, much-heralded year has arrived. And for many reasons, I'm saddened by the coming of this end that seems too premature for me to accept.

This is not to say that I have had a bad year; on the contrary, freshman year lived up to my expectations of being an exceedingly special, incredibly unique experience. I became totally free from that other world we call "home" only during vacations, ready to start off with the proverbial clean slate. The year began on a very exciting note — we all know the feeling of eagerness tinged with the novelty of being here during Freshman Days (the parties, the scoping, etc.).

As the year continued, I learned new things that didn't come from textbooks, like tasting my first upside-down margarita (and my second and third, for that matter), or dealing with a bank statement as obnoxious as an Econ problem set. I, who do not conjure up the image of a jock at first glance and who was never athletic in high school, learned how to row with the crew team, skied expertly like a beginner on the slopes of Brodie, and learned how to play foosball well enough to bring down a few male egos. But these things aren't unique only to me. They happened more or less to everyone; we all had to go through these types of experiences. They didn't characterize me as a person. So, despite everything that it seems I may have gained from the Williams experience these past months, the fact that only two weeks are left makes me realize that there are many things I missed.

Of course, the fact that I missed out on things is totally my fault; I procrastinated, I often exhibited general laziness, I had an attitude of 'I can do it later' quite frequently. I remember how excited I was during Nicole Meicher's speech to us on the first day about how we should take advantage of what this college has to offer us. It put me in one of those Army "Be all you can be" moods, and I really was ready to do everything. But I didn't even come close.

I suppose one main reason was because I spent a large portion of my time studying (or trying to, anyway). One of my upperclass friends told me that freshman year in college is really just an extension of high school for many people. I think he's right. We're all supposedly bright, top notch students used to being the best, and many of us try to keep that going as much as possible. But even though academic life is an important part of being here, it's not the only thing by far. College is not only a place to learn facts, it's a place to learn about being in the real world, and in the real world people don't go around spouting their GPA's in conversations.

The opportunities this College has to offer are immense. I know that sounds like a line from the admissions book of any and every college, but it happens to be the most honest way of putting it. The potential for growth here is extremely high. Conversely, we should realize that, as individuals, we have a great deal to offer the College. I'm not saying that we should fill up every minute of our time and burn ourselves out by being too involved. After all, I firmly believe that free time is good for the soul as well as being absolutely essential to keep one's sanity. But one should also realize that although we still may have three more years, in another sense we only have three more years. College is the time to be flexible, to try new things, to be bold and daring where you once might not have been.

Don't you ever dream about the myriad of things that you would be doing in college that you couldn't do in high school? Did you ever want to try theatre, or see how your writing skills fare, or become involved in groups out to change the world in some way or another? Perhaps you have some hidden talent that you aren't even aware of yet. You never know.

Giving things that initial try is probably the hardest part, but you'll never find out what you can do until you try (Trite, but very true.). In a sense, by fading back and being less involved than the average person, I have gotten a sense of what I intend to do next year. As long as I don't repeat my detachment next year, I'll be fine, but by doing little outside schoolwork I'll be losing out on the best education of all.

Some guesses at the concerns facing us for next September

Since this is the last issue of the Record until September, it is time to take a look ahead to the fall and what issues might affect our lives here at Williams. Already this year party policy, divestment, educational reforms, and racism on campus have become hot topics.

Another Word
by Andrew Mayer

Issues such as divestment, party policy and campus security reforms will probably continue to be in the news, but perhaps these topics have already run their course. While I can only make an educated guess, I believe that the following three questions will receive major attention next year.

- Will the Commission on Campus Race Relations announced yesterday by the President's Office help to quell and perhaps end racial tension on campus?

It has been three months exactly since the Black Student Union surprised most students with a letter containing charges of racism against both fellow students and professors. Since that time Dean of the College Stephen Fix and President Francis Oakley have met three times with members of the BSU, including two meetings with large groups.

The Commission on Campus Race Relations will be composed of students, faculty and staff, and, among other responsibilities, will hear complaints of students who believe they have been discriminated against. In addition, Oakley proposes to increase the education of freshmen about racism.

- Will the housing system be changed and become more equitable or continue to be manipulated by house presidents and students with friends in the Deans' Office?

As I reported two weeks ago, the housing system here just smells of abuse. I've heard stories of students threatening others into trading picks or moving out of a house; of one pair of students who asked a Dean for help in transferring and received it; of another pair, seniors with their fifth choice, who were stonewalled by the Deans at every turn; and, finally, of errors and favoritism that takes place in the housing affiliation transfer system.

The point is that if the housing system were fair and ways were available to satisfy more students with their housing, many of these problems would be eliminated. It remains to be seen whether the housing office or the Deans' Office will pick up on my suggestion and realize that the complaints they are receiving are due to the system and not to individual whining students.

- Will the inequality between men's and women's athletics at Williams be brought out into the open and will the athletic department realize its mistakes and correct them?

The problems of women's athletics are simply too many to mention here, but perhaps a few will suffice. Why is ther a "men's" soccer field and only if the men play away can the women use the "men's" field? Why does the field hockey team wear the same uniforms as the women's lacrosse team? Don't tell me the college can't afford separate uniforms.

Why does the softball team wear old baseball uniforms? And why since Weston field is under reconstruction did the baseball team take over the softball field down at Cole Field? Let them find their own field.

During squash season, why do the women always practice on the upper courts and the men on the lower courts? Since matches are played on the lower courts, the women effectively lose any home court advantage by always practicing on the upper courts.

The complaints go on and on, and the women athletes I have talked to are getting more and more upset. Some have even gone to the athletic office to discuss problems and have received no solace. Something must be done.

Yes, the column will be back in the fall if my editors let me continue. But unfortunately I won't win me the Pulitzer Prize. Who am I kidding?

charge those who claim to be "reporters" of news events to live up to their intentions and to share with the community what really goes on, especially when these events are publicized.

There are yet more things that can be said about the Gospel Choir and its effect on the College community. Nevertheless, I would again encourage you to raise yourself above your inadequacies in the hope that one day you can say, without a doubt, that — yes, I have reported the news.

Women's crew coverage errs in its omission of important novice win

To the Editor:

The Williams women's crew would like to correct a significant error in the May 6 article on the Lake Waramaug regatta of last Saturday, May 2, 1987. The article opens, "The men's JV heavyweight eight came away with Williams' only win...." This is not true. The women's novice four won their race, swamping Marist in a race that was decisive by the thousand-meter mark. This was an important win for this boat, which has spent most of the season racing only more experienced rowers in junior varsity races.

We would like to add that although we have been on the whole satisfied with the Record's coverage, it is unfortunate that it broke down at this point in our season.

MASS MoCA will require $72 million

Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA), College Treasurer William Reed and North Adams Mayor John Barrett announced further details about the plans for a Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art and Museum of Contermporary Architecture (MASS MoCA) in the Sprague Electric Marshall Street complex in North Adams.

A full briefing on the status of the museum complex is planned for May 26, based on the expectation that the master plan will be finalized by May 23.

The statement includes information on the acquisition of resources and funding for the MASS MoCA project. The Penn Central Corporation, the owner of Sprague Electric's Marshall Street Complex, may give the land and buildings to a non-profit entity that will be created to own the MASS MoCA complex.

The estimated cost of the project is $72 million. It is hoped that the state government through the provisions of the Convention Centers Bill now before the state legislature will provide a substantial amount of funding. A formal application for funding for the project in the amount of $35 million is being prepared, and will be submitted to the Office of Administration and Finance through the City of North Adams.

Art for the museum will come from the previously announced commitment by Count Panza to lend much of his collection to the article for a long period of time, the Williams College Museum of Art and possibly from the German Architecture Museum. Other loans and gifts from collectors are expected.

A study of the economic impact and operating analysis are being conducted by members of the college Economics department, and at the business schools at Yale and Wharton.

Hoopes, Pribram get Watsons

Two seniors have each been awarded $10,000 fellowships from the Watson Foundation for a year's independent study and travel. The recipients are Martha Hoopes and Karl Pribram.

Nominated last fall by a Williams faculty selection committee on the basis of outstanding performance within a chosen field, capacity for leadership, and the quality of the proposed project, the students are among the 80 seniors chosen from 45 small colleges and institutions to receive the fellowships.

Hoopes, a physics and English double major at Williams, plans to use the award to explore environmental education and examine resource recovery in Japan and India. Both countries have limited space and resources, yet Japan has a high rate of resource recovery, making it a model of recycling success, she says, while India lacks modern recycling programs. Hoopes hopes to return with a more precise knowledge of recycling potential and a greater sensitivity.

Pribram's proposal focuses on art-making as an interdisciplinary and vital process. A theatre major at Williams, Pribram plans to live in Berlin next year and hopes to write and opera based on some facet of his experiences there. He says his opera will encompass a variety of artistic languages and draw upon multiple political realities.

NEH awards to Hanson, Bailey

Junior Eric Hanson and sophomore James Bailey have been named Younger Scholars for 1987 by the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH). Hanson and Bailey are two of 37 high school and 88 full-time college students to win NEH Younger Scholar awards this year. Winners of this year's grants were selected from 650 eligible applicants in a nation-wide competition.

Under the guidance of his project adviser, Assistant Professor of English David L. Smith, Hanson will work on a project entitled "The Influence of the American Musical Tradition of the Blues on the writing of James Baldwin." Bailey's project, "The Meaning of Social Materialism of Marx's Social Ethics," will be directed by Professor of Political Science Kurt Tauber. Both Hanson and Bailey are expectd to produce substantial research papers to be submitted to the NEH with their final reports on their projects.

Dickerson to return

Dennis Dickerson, who was one of two tenured black faculty members at Williams when he left two years ago to take a position at Rhodes College in Memphis, will return to Williams in the fall of 1988. Next year he will be on leave at the University of Virginia.

When Dickerson returns, he will hold the rank of associate professor with tenure. He will be a member of the history department and will chair the Afro-American studies program. He will be teaching a new course, cross-listed with the religion department, on the history of the black church.

Dickerson graduated from Lincoln University in 1971 and received his Ph.D. from Washington University in 1978. He taught at Williams from 1976-85. He was the chairman of the Afro-American studies program from 1980-83 adn from 1984-5.

Jenks reports few fines

by Craig Gangi

"We don't go around looking for illegal activites," said Director of Security Ransom Jenks, discussing his department's role in enforcing the revised party regulations announced by the Dean's office April 1.

Since the inception of the new policy, there have been few instances in which houses were fined for infractions of the policy, according to Jenks.

Jenks said that, as he sees it, the policy is based on honor and trust. "If it doesn't result in a complaint and we don't find out about it, no one will be fined," he said.

Jenks said that, at most, only three or four $100 fines were issued to houses for violating the terms of the party policy, but he would not comment on what the infractions were.

Jenks and Assistant Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta said that the money collected for fines is put into a general fund used for daily college operations.

Kenyatta said there have been no problems yet with the administration of the House Entertainment Fund (HEF), which has been controlled this semester by the Dean's office, specifically, by Kenyatta.

"I talk to the house president about the event to be held, and after the event, I have to have receipts in order to have the money released from the account," she said.

Kenyatta said she does not see much room in the system for abuse, because the requirement of showing receipts to the Dean's office has eliminated the possibility of houses using the funds in the HEF for the purchase of alcohol.

Next year, said Kenyatta, house presidents will work more directly with the Comptroller's office and house associates, those faculty members affiliated with each upperclass house.

According to Kenyatta, the Comptroller's office will require receipts to prove how the money was used.

Kenyatta also said that because the HEF does not include freshman entries, each freshman's term bill will contain a $20 per year charge. The money will be placed into an account for each freshman entry on a per capita basis in a system similar to the entertainment fund for upperclassmen. Freshman entry representatives will have to submit receipts to the Comptroller's office for reimbursement of expenses.

Six to receive honorary degrees

Williams will award honorary degrees to six men and women with distinguished careers in journalism, economic and agricultural development, business and higher education. College President Francis Oakley will present their degrees at the college's 198th Commencement on Sunday, June 7.

Meg Greenfield, Pulitzer Prize-winning editorial page editor of "The Washington Post," will deliver the Commencement address, and will be awarded the degree of Doctor of Humane Letters.

Natalie Z. Davis, Henry Charles Lea Professor of History at Princeton University and the President of the American Historical Association, will speak at the Baccalaureate Service on Saturday, June 6, and will receive a Doctor of Letters degree at Commencement.

Koji Nakanishi, Centennial Professor of Chemistry at Columbia University, will be awarded the degree of Doctor of Science.

Doctor of Laws degrees will be awarded to Douglas Ensminger, Emeritus Professor of Rural Sociology at the University of Missouri, Columbia; W.L. Hadley Griffin, civic leader and Chairman of the Executive Committee and a Director of Brown Group, Inc.; and Stephen R. Lewis Jr., Herbert H. Lehman Professor of Economics at Williams, and President-elect of Carleton College.

Nakanishi, who was born in Hong Kong, has done extensive research in areas of chemistry associated with the eye, including retinal in areas of chemistry associated with the eye, including retinal proteins and isolation, structural and bio-organic studies of bioactive compounds. He received a B.Sc. degree from Nagoya University in 1947 and earned a Ph.D. from there in chemistry in 1954.

Ensminger, an expert in the field of agricultural development, spent 19 years (1951-1970) as the Ford Foundation's Representative in India. During this time he helped develop practical programs aimed at alleviating the problems of hunger, poverty and population in that country. While there he also served as a consultant to the Government of India on all phases of agriculture, rural development, family planning, rural enterprises and rural women in development. Ensminger earned a B.S. degree in rural sociology in 1934 from the University of Missouri, and earned a P.D. in rural sociology in 1939 from Cornell.

Griffin is a 1940 graduate of Williams and served on the college's Board of Trustees from 1975-80. He received a law degree from Washington University in 1947 and joined Wohl Shoe Company, which later merged with Brown Shoe Company, as legal counsel. Griffin became President of Brown Shoe Company in 1968 and Chief Executive Officer in 1969. He was elected the first Chairman of the Board, President and Chief Executive Officer of The Brown Group, Inc., at its formation in 1972. He retired as Chairman of the Board in 1985, and now serves as Chairman of the Executive Committee and a Director of the corporation. He has combined his business ability particularly in the city of St. Louis where he served as Chairman of the United Way fund drive in 1972 and as President of the organization the following year.

Lewis, who graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Williams in 1960, returned to the economics department as an assistant professor in 1966 after earning his Ph.D. from Stanford in 1963. A highly-respected expert on economic policy and planning in developing countries, Lewis has served in long-term advisory positions in Pakistan, Kenya and, particularly, Botswana. In 1982, when Botswana's president awarded him the Presidential Order of Meritorious Service, he became the first American to receive that country's highest civilian honor. He was named president of Carleton College last February, following an eight-month nationwide search.

Commission

challenges they pose," Oakley said in the letter.

Commission's functions

The President's letter outlined four specific functions which the new commission will fulfill. It will be charged with "reviewing existing grievance procedures", "organizing an educational program for incoming freshmen", "mounting other activities or events during the course of the academic year designed to further the same end" and "acting as a resource for the Committee on Educational Policy as it reviews the responsiveness of our curriculum to minority experiences, achievements and concerns".

The Commission on Campus Race Relations will be composed of approximately nine members, including faculty, students and staff. The President and Dean Fix will select the members from nominations submitted by the College Council, the WBSU, and the Faculty Steering Committee and self-nominations submitted by college community members.

Oakley said that the educational program for freshmen would probably consist of a program during freshman days and a follow-up program later in the year. He indicated that the Commission would be responsible for recommendations as to what sort of program would be the most effective.

The Commission will also be responsible for the organization of commemoration for Martin Luther King Day, Black History Month, and other events and activities, as well as reviewing curricular offerings and making recommendations to the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP).

Controversial function

The most controversial function of the new commission is that of reviewing existing grievance procedures. Although some WBSU leaders have said that they were dissatisfied when presented with the President's plan, Oakley said that the WBSU leaders did not express dissatisfaction at that time.

"In fact, the idea that we might also have a system of direct nomination, for anyone who wants to put his name forward, came out of our last meeting," he said, crediting the idea to one of the WBSU leaders.

Oakley told the Record, "There are formal grievance procedures. It's an issue of the visibility of those procedures. If we do have major grievances, it's very important that our grievance procedures be effective."

The Commission, according to Oakley, will "test how well students know of existing procedures. . . There are ways that they can be changed."

Insensitivity

"My sense is that in addition to formally grievable incidents, there is another range of complaints which includes cases of insensitivity," continued Oakley. "Listening to the incidents or examples they (the WBSU) raised, most fell in the range of insensitivity, sometimes, I am afraid, gross insensitivity. That, I think, is where I would conceive of most of the cases falling.

Kevin Hinton, a coordinator of the WBSU, said of Oakley, "He didn't give us anything concrete in our meetings. I'm talking about specifics, methodology, and what its structure will be."

"In February, the BSU sent President Oakley a letter," said Hinton. "One of our demands was to set up a grievance committee employing new procedures. He says that he is not interested in altering existing grievance procedures, so there's no way that we can see this new commission as satisfying that concern at this point.

"The next step is to get together with the College Council because Carter (Zinn, College Council president) has displayed an interest in pursuing the issue."

The College Council will discuss its future role in the formation of the grievnce committee at a special meeting open to all students on Thursday. At this meeting, the WBSU will present a proposal to the College Council. Hinton said that this proposal will be written this week by a group of four or five WBSU leaders who have been especially concerned with the formation of a grievance committee.

"It's news to me," Oakley said when asked about the plans of the WBSU leaders to present a proposal concerning a grievance committee to the College Council. "It might involve a duplication of effort," he added.

Zinn said, "Basically, the power of this committee lies with the students. If they feel that this important campus-wide issue was settled underground or behind their backs, the commission will be able to address less in terms of long-term student-student relationships, because it will not have credibility in the eyes of the students."

"The College Council has taken an autonomous stance," Zinn said. "We see a need for a new institution to deal with the problems for which presently no institution exists".

Martin White, also a WBSU coordinator, said, "I think President Oakley has done this in good faith. I think, however, that there is a certain amount of nervousness that there will be a putting off of certain specific issues that BSU members were concerned about. I think its a good start and I think there will be more suggestions made."

White said that the WBSU would bring a proposal to the College Council, "in order to make the general community more aware of the specific details which were discussed with Oakley." He continued, "When we made the demands, we wanted them immediately and final details have been put off until late in the year, which makes it difficult for us to judge until we see the policy implemented."

"Listening to the incidents or examples they (the WBSU) raised, most fell in the range of insensitivity, sometimes, I am afraid, gross insensitivity."

—President Francis Oakley

"He (Oakley) says that he is not interested in altering existing grievance procedures, so there's no way that we can see this new commission as satisfying that concern at this point."

collect witness statements and had allowed evidence to be displaced or swept away by the car wrecking company.

Police investigation

The head of investigation into the accident, Officer Michael Kennedy, a 16-year member of the Williamstown Police Department, defended his investigation as complete and thorough. "I couldn't have done anything more if I did it today," he said.

Kennedy said that all measurements relevant to the case were taken. "Mr. Miller would have you believe that the Krouse car forced a car off the road to the right when he came off Moorland Avenue at 30 miles per hour," he said.

Kennedy said that his investigation supported the prosecution's contention that Miller struck Krouse's car by illegally passing on Cole Avneue while Krouse was attempting a left-hand turn onto Prospect Street.

Kennedy said that Moorland Street was not included in his measurements because it played no role in the accident.

The defense also contended that Krouse's car was struck in the rear by another vehicle, causing it to lose control before being struck by Miller. Kennedy said, "I testified that I inspected the rear (of Krouse's car) twice and there was no indication that it was hit from the rear."

Kennedy said that all evidence was noted in the reconstruction of the accident before being swept by the wrecking company. He said that the distribution and placement of debris indicated a point of impact that disproved Miller's testimony.

The prosecution had testimony from seven witnsses, including the driver behind Miller in a line of four cars. Kennedy said that the jury chose to disregard the prosecution witnesses after hearing Miller's testimony. "I'm not going to tell you what I think about the verdict because that's not suitable for print," Kennedy said.

Under Massachusetts law, the jury was not permitted to consider two previous convictions for operating to endanger that Miller had received in 1976 and 1982. The 1982 conviction was as a result of a similar passing violation.

Peer Health sex survey reveals demand for Pill

by Beth Broadrup

Some 401 students, 20 percent of the student body, responded to a recent Peer Health survey. Among those returning the questionnaire were 216 women and 185 men. According to Sheri Pym '89, a member of Peer Health, the organization conducted the survey to see how many students Peer Health reaches and how it can improve its services.

Pym said Peer Health members were pleased with student response; she noted that a 20 percent return of a mail-conducted survey is unusually high. Pym acknowledged that the group responding to the survey may not be representative of the student body, but she said it is hard to know which way the group may have been biased. Peer Health plans to consider implementing useful suggestions from students surveyed, she said.

Of the 401 responding students, 47 women and 40 men (about 20 percent of those responding) have visited the Contraceptive Clinic; 14 women and five men have used the Call-in/Walk-in service; 15 women have used pregnancy testing; and four women and three men have taken advantage of general counseling services. Some students said that they would not use Peer Health because the pill is not available there. A few others questioned its confidentiality and competency.

The Pill

Availability of the pill is a real issue for Peer Health. They would like to offer it at clinic prices ($3 per pack). Students responded to this possibility enthusiastically; 173 women and 54 men replied that they would purchase the pill if it were available. Pym said, however, "It doesn't look like we can get the pill" for such a small market. The pill is available at clinic prices in North Adams, though, and Peer Health is considering ways to enable students to take advantage of this more easily if the pill is not sold at Williams.

Students had numerous suggestions to improve the Peer Health freshman entry talk. These included: more information and less joking; a description of buying contraceptives at the clinic; information on AIDS, date rape, and the right to say no; explaining birth control devices more clearly; addressing sex at Williams, and single sex talks.

Sexually active

The majority of students responding to the survey said they are sexually active (68 percent of women, 69 percent of men), and most are active both at and away from Williams. Fifty-five percent of the women reported that they used birth control, as did 60 percent of the men. Only seven percent of the women and eight percent of the men said they do not use birth control. A small group of students (11

Entry t-shirt topics run the gamut

by Erik T. Burns

By the end of freshman year identities are lost. The 500-odd students who once realized their personhood by the semi-insulting, semi-ingratiating, but always proud rubric of freshman, or froshburger, or rookie, or peon, are slowly but surely becoming sophomores, their lower class status usurped with as-yet-unknown dignity by the incoming class.

Within the freshman class there are subunits, groups of people that, because of some random number in some computer somewhere on campus, became close friends, or enemies. Proximity is the name of the game, and those chosen few who surround one can make or break a social life.

Sage D residents model their new entry t-shirts. (Kershaw)

Closely knit

The crux of this social breakdown is the entry, the group of 20 or so students who live in the same building, eat together, share bathrooms, and generally get on each others' nerves. By the end of the year this closely knit group is ready to go on at Williams, solidly grounded socially and mentally, a peer group solidified. And there is a certain feeling of closeness, of accomplishment, in knowing that, as an entry, you have survived the rigors of freshman year.

That closeness and that pride rears its ugly head and shows itself to the fearful world in spring, when entry t-shirts hit the scene.

Overserved

Entry shirts and slogans run the gamut of topics, from the imbibatory prowess of entry fellows to the sexual exploits or failures of the group. Some are cryptic, some are obvious, all incorporate the entry's concept of a sense of humor.

This year's freshman are sporting a bumper crop of shirts with slogans coined from a veritable plethora of pithy, drunken quote board gems. For example, Sage B's shirt fronts the message "It is entirely possible that I have been overserved," the sodden explanation given by Bruce Willis (of Moonlighting fame) as to his debilitated condition. Williams B's shirt offers the two-parter "What floor are we going to do it on? — Who's going to mop?" innuendo-filled reference to their inability to plan party locales.

Some entries carry well-shouldered chips, such as Lehman's "Lehman Uber Alles... Flume the Quad!!" or Sage C's offering "We've had parties... you just weren't invited." Sage D, the self proclaimed "Doll Hut," defends its vagrant reputation with the indignant yet proud phrase "Say what you will, you drank our swill."

"SO?"

It is at times difficult for an, entry to decide on a slogan. This is evident in Sage F's attempt, which is a simple "SO?" Said an entry member about the choice, "We're an all-girl entry. We wanted something that wasn't about girls, or guys, or drinking. This is what we came up with."

And, of course, there are some shirts that defy categorization, such as Morgan

Profile:

Phil Smith

by Alex Oh

If there is a name that every Williams student has at one point or another dreaded, it's Philip F. Smith. Over the past 28 years, that name has instilled fear and anxiety into the hearts of every Williams prospective.

When you meet him in person, however, you can't help but wonder how a man of such gentle disposition could evoke such fear.

Smith, the director of admissions, said he dislikes the negative aspect of his job: "There's one week in April," he said with a slight frown, "during which I have to call about 100 alumni and explain why we're not going to be admitting their sons or daughters. That's not a fun week."

Director of Admissions Philip F. Smith '55 has been reading candidates' folders since 1959. (Hazen)

Folders

Looking over at the table over where the stacks of wait-listed applicants' folders lie, he sighed and said, "I'd love to have all of these people here."

Smith said he has had to live through many uncomfortable and unpleasant moments such as the above-mentioned week in April, but he said that doesn't stop him from loving Williams.

Born in Sutton, Massachusetts, he came to work at Williams in 1959 as an assistant to the Director of Admissions. Since Smith had been a member of the class of 1955, Williamstown was not unfamiliar. He majored in American History of Literature (now known as American Studies) at Williams, and then studied English at Harvard University. With the M.A.T. he earned at Harvard, he experimented with teaching during brief stints at Needham and Deerfield academies. He was entertaining hopes of becoming a headmaster at a prep school when he came to Williams, he said.

20 percent bracket

During his stay at Williams, Smith said he has seen numerous changes take place. The most exciting and noteworthy, he said, is the school's growth into both a national and international institution. He noted that there was only one black student and there were no Asians in his graduating class of 315. Now, according to Smith, the school is looking to up the minority enrollment to over 20 percent, a significant increase in his opinion.

Smith said he is quite happy with the current state of admissions affairs, but he added, "There's always room for change at the margins." And what possible changes would he like to see in the future?

International

"I'd like for the school to reach an even more international status." In order to accomplish this, Smith said he sees the need to increase financial aid in that direction, a challenge that involves numerous complications, including a possible decrease in domestic students.

Smith has had other interests within the community over the years. He coached the freshman soccer team, and he presided over the ABC (A Better Chance) community service program for minority students during the 1960's. He also taught a section of American History at

Ramones play to small but enthusiastic crowd

by Thomas Cunningham

That vanguard punk band from New York City, the Ramones, played less than enthusiastically to a more-than-enthusiastic audience April 30 at the Lansing-Chapman rink.

Over 500 people attended, estimated Matt LaPointe '88, president of the Student Activities Council (SAC), which sponsored the concert.

The crowd, herded together in front of the stage, was watched carefully by what seemed to be almost as many Williamstown police, SAC members, and College Security guards. A Williamstown police officer made frequent searches of the bathroom cubicles, hurrying people along. A small contingent of hardcore punks in full regalia clustered near the bleachers. Within the crowd, Purple Cow gin and Jack Daniels were passed around discreetly as police stared on.

The opening band was Kingface, from Washington, D.C. They played some very high-energy, straight rock and roll, and the audience seemed unsure whether to slam or listen. The crowd's general mood was somewhat apathetic. A great power version of Hendrix's "Stone Free" managed to pick up the pace considerably.

Slam central

The Ramones came out, dressed in black leather jackets, stepping out of a cloud of smoke. The crowd instantly released all the energy that it so sorely lacked for Kingface's set and pushed forward, reaching out for the band. The flimsy wooden barriers erected by SAC were soon smashed by the more than enthusiastic audience.

Immediately, the forward members of the crowd were caught up in a frenzy of slam-dancing, whether they wished to be or not. Although bodies were smashing together quite violently in the thick of the action, few were hurt, and the crowd's general mood was amazingly positive. Slammers appeared extremely energetic, but not at all violent or destructive. Anyone falling over on the dance floor was immediately picked up by several hands and thrust back into slam central. Most people seemed to be enjoying themselves greatly.

"Onetwothreefour"

The Ramones played one set and two encores. Although the performance lacked an overall excitement, the Ramones delivered 90 minutes of their trademark high-energy thrash. Starting with a double tempo 'Blitzkrieg Bop,' they kept the crowd dancing, pausing only after a song long enough to count off the next in a frenzied "onetwothreefour." They may not have seemed enthusiastic, but they certainly were tight.

Security seemed quite unprepared for the crowd's reaction to the Ramones. After the Transfers adjust to Williams

by Michael Barsanti

Some people don't go to Williams for four years. Some students leave before they graduate, and some just come to Williams as exchanges for a year or a semester, but others are transfer students who arrive at Williams sometime between freshman days and senior week and cannot be found in their graduating classes' facebook. They come from places like Yale and Berkshire Community College for reasons such as the English department or the size of the student body. For these advantages, they give up their old lives and schools, starting over socially, if not academically, in a tightly-knit college environment.

Each year 150 to 200 students apply to transfer to Williams in September, and 20 to 25 are accepted, according to Jo Ann Gray-Murray, admissions officer in charge of coordinating transfer applications. These applications come from both "traditional" students who have gone directly from high school to college, and from

Young problem solvers visit campus

by Michael Erard

On the morning of May 2, 500 elementary and high school students from across the Commonwealth converged on Williams College to participate in the 1987 Massachusetts Problem Solving Bowl, sponsored by the Massachusetts Association for the Advancement of Individual Potential.

The topic of this year's bowl was illiteracy. Students had done research on the topic, but only when they entered the competition, both in teams and as individuals, were they given a scenario. With the scenario in mind, the teams had to give 20 conditional problems (individual students gave ten), and then specify one underlying problem, the solution of which might solve some of the others.

Then they had to give 20 solutions and select the best ten, evaluate them in terms of five criteria (such as, how feasible is it? how realistic is it?), and rate them. The solution which received the highest score then had to be developed and "sold" both through an essay and a skit done later in the day.

Braces and bows

Several future problem solvers from Barnstable were at lunch on Saturday. These were normal sixth-grade kids, all braces and bows, well-dressed and jaunty, asking where the nearest stores were and wanting to buy Williams paraphernalia.

When asked about her college plans, one blonde Benetton-bedecked girl said, "I'm really not thinking about college right now."

And when a parent asked, "Is there an art museum on campus?" one sixth grade boy retorted, "I don't want to go to an art museum." Pretty normal.

They had interesting solutions, on top of it all. One suggested that a classroom of eight to 12 immigrants be taught by volunteers. Another girl suggested that people hook themselves up to a dream machine so they can learn while while they sleep. Someone else proposed that libraries sponsor literacy programs. The team from Canton suggested that never-ending bookstrips be shown at movie theaters (in order to find out the ending, you have to read the book).

Solar shack

Kids from a program for gifted students in Chicopee proposed a solution to a waste problem that saved their city $119,500. In a demonstration of initiative and ingenuity that will send them to the national competition, 7th and 8th graders showed up the town officials by proposing a solar shack that would keep sludge from the waste treatment plant from freezing. Town engineers subsequently implemented the suggestions.

"The problems are already there. Coming up with solutions is more creative," said Matt Goff, one of the students quoted in the Chicopee Transcript Telegram.

Teams presented skits to "sell" their solutions. The students' entertaining and emotional approaches to the problem and to the persuading itself were refreshing breaks from dry, ultra-rational, self-important discussions often found on campus.

Middle-school views

The skits presented interesting views of the world from middle-school eyes: education is valued, adults have supportive interrelationships without concern for ideology, reading is most often a tool for a better job, less often a means to self-esteem, and never an end in itself. They presented worlds in which private organizations had public responsibilities, Governor Michael S. Dukakis

Wesleyan

Wesleyan's Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Awareness Days (B. GLAD) were marked by several incidents of vandalism, predominantly the theft of B. GLAD week banners. A pink triangle banner was removed from a campus building — and re-hung there three times — while a similar one was taken from a balcony and torn up by a group of males at 2 a.m. on April 23. Two days later, unidentified students were spotted on Andrus Field burning a B. GLAD banner. The students fled at the approach of Public Safety officers, who had initially thought the midnight fire was a flashlight. Gay Lesbian Alliance member Natalie Difloth '87 commented, "The banners state that we exist. The people who took them down are saying that they don't want to see that."

Dartmouth

The measles outbreak at Dartmouth rages on. Although no new cases were reported within a week's time, Dr. John Turco, Director of Health Services, is prepared for the appearance of a "second generation" of cases. Thirty-two students currently have the measles. Turco sees the Dartmouth outbreak as part of a national pattern; more than a dozen outbreaks have been reported across America, including 40 to 60 cases at Exeter Academy in New Hampshire. The source of Dartmouth's epidemic was most likely a student who contracted measles while on vacation and brought it back to campus. An investigation into the immunization records of Dartmouth measles victims revealed that 19 of 32 patients had been immunized, as had all of the Exeter cases. Turco attributed this trend to "waning immunity," the theory that a person becomes more susceptible to the disease the longer it has been since immunization.

Even More Dartmouth

The Women's Issues League (WIL) sponsored a march against sexism at Dartmouth starting at midnight April 30. The hour-long march drew approximately 100 participants, one third of them men, on a walk behind dormitories and along fraternity row. The marchers carried banners and candles as they chanted, "These sexist frats have got to go." Residents of the dorms responded calmly to the protest march, although a group of six frat men did come outside to sing "Men of Dartmouth," the school's controversial Alma Mater. The march followed the previous week's distribution of a Zeta Psi fraternity newsletter that portrayed the supposed sexual exploits of a "Zete brother" and a freshman's satirical verses and cartoons concerning sexual adventures in his dorm.

Bryn Mawr

Williams is not the only place where room draw creates incessant tension and headaches. Bryn Mawr's Class of 1991 exceeds the current freshman class in size by 30. In order to accomodate this increase, upperclassmen will shoulder the housing burden. Current senior suites will become freshman quads or triples according to one proposal, while rising sophomores have been asked to room together in upperclass doubles. Freshman Jessica Disman summed up the whole room draw process in these words: "It was anxiety."

runs for president five times, Vanna White can't read the words she turns over, and illiterates can be made to learn.

Of the competition and its preparation, Eileen Drummond, 5th grade teacher at the Williamstown Elementary School, said it teaches kids "how to learn on their own, to think, to communicate."

Challenges

"It's a way for extending children beyond the usual classroom," she said. "I go in it for the process." The children she coaches in the Future Problem Solvers program are not all "gifted" children; she said she looks for students who are highly motivated, committed, and who can accept challenges.

"Some of the reading for this topic was not ordinarily reading that ten-year-olds would do. They didn't balk at the reading."

Drummond had high praise for the program and the children. She said that the success of such a program is, ultimately, what happens to the Future Problem Solvers in the future. She said she thinks the problem-solving skills will stay with the kids for a long time. She added that some of the Harvard graduate students who evaluated competition booklets several years ago had been Future Problem Solvers themselves.

Bolin Fellows

the financial constraints that usually plague dissertation projects.

He said he turned down an offer to teach in the political science department because the nature of his research dictates working at a school near a large urban center in order to gather data. "If I had been doing less empirical research, Williams would have been my first choice," he said. He will be teaching at Rutgers University next year.

Anglin taught "Afro-American Politics" and said of Williams students, "They need to be pushed because they accept things much more than they should."

He said he did not sense any hostility toward minorities in the Williamstown community. "I've been quite heartened. It's been a very genuine small town atmosphere. I'm very open to people and they talk back."

Assistant to the President Nancy McIntire pointed out that although this year's Bolin Fellows will not be staying, they may be influential in attracting other minority students and faculty members to Williams.

McIntire said she did not think the situation with Lubiano's son says anything about Williams. She called it "a regrettable incident with an agency in the community."

Reichert said there are a number of other schools thinking of setting up their own fellowships and that he has been contacted by six or seven other deans of faculty who wanted to know more about Williams' program.

"If we have started a trend that other places are going to follow, I think that's terrific," he said. "The number of minority students going on to Ph.D. work is declining. Anything that we can do to send a signal that this is something we value ... I think we're doing good."

women and five men) said that they or their partner had been pregnant. The majority of these pregnancies were terminated, according to 11 of the women and four of the men. One man and one additional woman reported pregnancies that had been carried to term.

The survey also showed that Williams students have been victims of sexually transmitted diseases. Six women and three men responded that they have had a disease, but only one woman and one man reported that they had gotten the disease at Williams.

Students offered overall suggestions to improve Peer Health and its services. One student said Peer Health should find ways to make people more comfortable about using its services. Four suggested that the pill be made available, and another said that students who have been pregnant could offer counselling for currently pregnant students. Four students responded that they find Peer Health's Daily Advisor ads offensive.

Peer Health held a meeting Sunday night to discuss the responses to its survey and begin planning ways to put valuable student suggestions into action.

T-shirts

Mideast's "An euhemerist's dream." Or Morgan Midwest's "Spawn of Satan" (accompanied by a detailed drawing of Morgan with the entry in question turned to post-apocalypse rubble).

Dola Patrolla

The occasional shirt causes a double-take, such as East One's "Vidl, Vici, Veni ... Helping America Lick Crack," or Fayerweather Three's mysterious "Dola Patrolla ... Hit me with a brick." Said F-3 JA Annie Cordova, "As a proud Dola I refuse to reveal the source of this slogan on the grounds that it might incriminate me."

One of the standouts this year is Morgan West's. "Will you love me forever?" is on the front; the back replies, "Let me sleep on it."

Cryptic enough

And, of course, there is the aesthetically pleasing shirt, the perfect slogan. Easy to say, cryptic enough to baffle the casual observer, and undoubtedly the product of a demented set of altered minds. Each entry is sure that their slogan is that one, that ultimate pun. For each soon-to-be-sophomore, that shirt sums up, in a limited yet material way, his or her freshman experience. And even if no one else thinks it's funny, or no one else cares, those 20 friends have the pleasure of the joke over which to chuckle among themselves.

By the way, "Bring it. I've got wood."

filmsy barricade was knocked down, they tried to shield the Ramones with their own bodies. Needless to say, they were pummeled by slamdancing fans, and more than one dancer was thrown off of the dance floor by security and police. Equilibrium was eventually achieved with the bulk of the dancing taking place about fifteen feet from the stage.

When the Ramones ended their set with their traditional "We're a Happy Family," the crowd acted tired but happy. They seemed to have enjoyed the huge energy release induced by the nature of the show.

The small group of people at the Ramones concert certainly got what they came for, from the enterprising freshmen waving a homemade "Wart Hog" banner at Dee-Dee and Joey to the merely curious who wrote off the event as an experience to relate to the grandchildren.

Williams.

Smith said he has a lot of respect for Williams students' abilities, which he measures in "meritocratic" terms, meaning "on the basis of how a student has succeeded in meeting challenges." He said he strongly believes that Williams students are "absolutely first rate," and added, with a laugh, "the U.S. News and World Report is right."

Transfers

"non-traditional" students, people that Gray-Murray described as "perhaps older students that have not followed the usual course, or community college students with aspirations to go beyond their AA degree."

Closely scrutinized

The admissions process for transfers is very similar to the process for freshman admissions, except that the admissions committee uses different sources for evaluating a candidate, Gray-Murray said. According to Gray-Murray, the traditional transfer or exchange already has a college record, which is closely scrutinized. But a non-traditional applicant may not have a college record, or SAT's, or any recent grades, she noted, in which case the committee has to consider "what a person has accomplished in their time away from school."

While the majority of those 200 applicants are traditional students, Gray-Murray said that there is an emphasis placed on the non-traditional and community college students, since these people are more likely to want more out of Williams than "a change of scenery," and can add more to the diversity the school.

Assistant Dean of the College Sheila Spear, who is in charge of the orientation and special needs of transfer and exchange students, agreed that change is not a good enough reason to switch schools. She said that transfers should have "a reason for transferring so that they will add to the student body." But the mix of students from different backgrounds means a mix of different preparations that must be meshed into the Williams curriculum.

Orientation

Socially, the Dean's Office tries to blend new students into Williams life with freshman-like orientations, involving cookouts for all transfers and exchanges, meeting members of College Council, and speaking with former transfer students. There are also informal meetings later in the year.

For many students that begin here as upperclassmen, this adjustment is not easy. Laura Scanlan '87, who transferred from Tufts during her junior year, and Caroline Koeppel '87, who transferred as a junior from Wellesley, described their adjustment as difficult because they were placed in a Mission Park suite with other transfers and exchanges. They observed that since the freshman housing system tends to form very close, small groups of friends that move into upperclass houses together, new students have to break in to these groups.

While Koeppel said that she thought their arrangement was good at the time because they had the support of other new students, she said that they felt isolated from other students. According to Scanlan and Koeppel, transfers are also frequently mistaken for exchanges or visiting students by people who are surprised to see them back for another year, or who congratulate them a year too late for their admission.

Support

Anne Knott, a junior transfer from Yale who will be returning there next year, said she was surprised by our "accessibility to the outdoors" and by the speed with which people knew of her. She said that "running cross country and going to Nantucket over Winter Study were the best things to do." Knott said she is returning to Yale next year "not because Williams didn't meet my expectations, but because I feel I should finish what I started. If I had started at Williams, I would stay here."

Greg Leake '89 is staying, and said he believes that the support for transfer students is "as good as it can be done." Leake transferred from Swarthmore this year, and said that the major difference between the two schools is that Williams has more science courses and a better social life.

game, Wesleyan rolled over Amherst by a score of 24—3.

The Killer B's started out their day by destroying the Cardinal B-side by a score of 44—0. In a similar situation to that of the A- side, the B-side was awarded only 20 minutes to rest in between games. Against Amherst, after trailing 4—0, the B's scored with a penalty kick to make it 4—3. Despite the outstanding efforts of seniors Dan Shore, Jim Frantz, Eric Valdez, Andy Anselmi, Tom Connelly and Barton George, the Killer B's could not muster up enough energy to defend against the Lord Jeffs and went down in defeat by a score of 10—3.

While the A's and B's ended their season on a down note, the club as a whole was given a big boost by the efforts of the lower sides in their scrimmage against a strong North Adams squad on Friday. The club will be preparing for graduating many irreplaceable players, but is already preparing for battle against the Lord Jeffs next season.

Tim Sullivan all rounded out their Williams careers by winning their head-to-head brackets.

Coach Rick Pohle was ecstatic about the team's convincing Little Three victory: "There's no doubt about it — the Little Three is a season in itself. To win it as dominantly as the team did really takes the monkey off their back."

Second in NESCAC's

In action earlier in the week, the Ephs did not fare as well, placing second in the NESCAC tournament to an underdog Wesleyan team. The eight-team tourney was held at Taconic Golf Club in Williamstown, and the home squad took the lead after the first day only to fall to their Little Three rival the next.

While the Little Three championships wrapped up the season for most Williams golfers, Tim Frechette '89 has one more tourney yet to play. The sophomore will travel to the Division III Nationals in Ohio on May 18-19. He gained an invitation on the basis of his strong play this spring and during last fall's season.

Coach Pohle feels Frechette will place at the Nationals: "Tim's a gutsy player who won't back away from a challenge. I'd say he'll finish in the top 25 (of the 125 golfers)."

M. Lacrosse

Although Williams may have done better with more rest, Lamb's philosophy is to play all the time and enjoy doing it. "We're a lacrosse team, so we play lacrosse;" said Lamb "we all enjoy playing as much as possible"

It was with this credo in mind that the Ephs boarded a bus last Saturday to travel to Hamilton for their season finale less than twelve hours after retuning from Middlebury. Although junior Dana Weeder played an excellent game in the goal, the Ephmen couldn't catch the rested Continentals,losing by four and dropping their record to an even .500 for the year.

"Playing so much was challenging, but we enjoyed it," offered Gallup. "We had a successful year, ended at 6-6, made it to the ECAC semifinals and played more games than most other schools, so we did well"

Williams expects to field a strong team again next year despite losing three of its top seven scorers to graduation, including tri-captain Mike O'Connell who led the team in scoring for most of the year before bowing to a head injury. Steve Patterson (14 points) and Jim Sperry (12 points) will also be sorely missed. Freshmen standouts Santry (30 points) and Tim Oliver (13 points) figure to lead the attack along with sophomore Lew Fisher (7goals, including two in the Tufts win) and high scoring middie Gilbert (20 points).

The heart of the defense will be lost as captains Taylor Watts and Gallop and Dan McCarthy are all graduating seniors, but the return of injured junior Dave Crompton should offset that somewhat. The midfield should continue to improve as a strong crop of sophomores and juniors step in to replace seniors Rob Miller and Chris Traggio.

off Haley Clifford surprised everyone as she jumped on a loose ball to make the score 8-0.

Midd pass and drove 15 meters into the zone. Petersen kept the crowd in suspense as her kick hit the far post and bounced in to make the final score 20-0.

Dartmouth was held to one try in the first half by the Williams 15. Superb tackles by Raquel Holmes '90 and Petersen were a deciding factor in holding off the Green attack. Annie Cordova '88 created Williams' first real scoring threat as she kicked the ball deep in Green territory before she was apprehended by a large Dartmouth woman. Dartmouth scored twice in the second half to make the score 14-0 but Williams never gave up. Kate Shaw '87 broke through lineouts, and Carol Smallwood '87 provided devastating tackles for the Ephs.

The Killer B's steamrolled their Middlebury opposition, shutting them out. Sophomore Kerry Kilander continued her fine season by scoring two penalty tries to lead the ruggers to a 10-0 first half lead.

Sumin Eng '87 grabbed the ball from a maul and ran 15 meters before passing off to Heather Adams '90 who barreled in to make the score 14-0. Ali Jones '89 demanded the next try. In a show of true rugby desire she plowed 25 meters to make the tally 18-0. Adams got the call again as she made a zigzag run for 30 meters to finish the scoring at 22-0.

The Dartmouth 15 proved to be tough opposition for the Killer B's second game which the Green won, 10-0. Lineys Dagny Maidman '90 and Ann Arnason '89 made energetic yardage-gaining runs and the entire pack put forth a great effort.

The C women remained undefeated this season with their 18-0 toasting of Midd. Kristin Moomaw '90, scored twice in the first half. The scrum executed a sly crossover penalty play as Moomaw ran past confused blue lineys to make the score 6-0 after Claire Manwell '89 converted. Jill Magnuson '90 passed off to Sue Roe '90 who ran 15 meters and passed off to Moomaw to make the first half score 10-0. Manwell provided valuable kicks and tackles throughout the whole game. Annabel Sheinberg '89 played tough in the scrum.

The two second half trys featured great runs. Kathie Lapey '90 took a Liz Martin '90 pass and demanded her first try of the season. In the closing minutes Sue Pitcher '90 scored an unassisted try as she ran 50 meters to complete the scoring at 18-0.

place until the Ephs missed the last handoff and finished just out of the point chase with a time of 44.0 seconds. Junior Ted Arrowsmith and senior Dave Grossman were the Eph entrants in the 3000 meter steeplechase and 5000 meters respectively.

Both runners were with the lead packs through the halfway marks and then fell victim to the warm weather and fast early paces. Captain Jon Fisher '87 set the pace throughout most of the lightning quick 1500 m, but was spent and consequently unable to sustain his feared 300m kick and finished in a respectable seventh place with a fast time of 3:58.0.

Lopez stars

On the track, the Eph individuals who tallied points were Andre Lopez '87 and Swart. In the morning, Lopez eased through the 800 meter trial in 1:55, and in the afternoon he blistered through the final to win in 1:50.88, only 00.19 of a second off the meet record. Lopez appears ready to show the people in Chicago his silk and compete in the 800m at the Nationals.

Swart gained points by finishing fifth in the 200m with a time of 22.5 seconds. He finished strong down the stretch after having a hard time getting out of the blocks. By this time the Eph competitors knew the title was out of reach, but the 4x400m relay team of Jeff Etemad '89, Dave Nadelman '89, Fisher and Lopez still ran very competitively to finish in 5th place with a time of 3:22.

Thus the men's team was not able to give Coach Richard Farley the going away present that it hoped to, but the Ephmen still had a fine season, winning the NESCAC and Little Three titles and finishing with an 36-4 overall record. The individual season is all that is left for the Williams competitors at the Nationals.

The women's team competed at Bowdoin Saturday and Sunday in the ECAC Division III meet. Results were not available at press time.

Softball

After a rainout earlier in the week, the softball team lost its final game of the season to North Adams to close out the year with a record of 5-4. The highlight of the year was winning the first Little Three title as Amherst formed a club team to play against Williams and Wesleyan.

Two of the team's losses came at the hands of Trinity, where the Ephwomen gave the Bantams their closest games of the entire year. Aside from these two losses, solid defense and the pitching of Nancy Hedeman '89 (who pitched every inning of every game) kept the Ephs in every game. Spectacular hitting by graduating captains Tory Ballard and Kathy Oehling and good contributions down the lineup were instrumental in the Ephs' fine 5-4 season.

Tennis

After a crushing 9-0 defeat of Union at home on Thursday, the Ephs traveled to Boston where they lost a tough 5-4 match against the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The loss was only their second in a stunning 8-2 season which included the added coup of the New England Small College Athletic Conference championship.

At M.I.T., the match again came down to doubles. In singles, only Marc Caltabiano '90 at number four and Chris Myers '87 at number five won their matches, each taking three set victories. Going into doubles down 4-2, Williams still had a chance.

Kevin Callanan '87 and Drew Sawyer '89 at number one and Pier Friend '88 and Brad Hunt '90 at three both scored victories for the Ephs, bringing the tally to four all. The pressure was on Hoyt Luddington '88 and Caltabiano at number two, and the pair played a tough match, but finally fell after multiple match points in a third set tie-breaker, 7-5. As captain Callanan said, "the whole match came down to one tie-breaker."

The Ephmen had experienced better luck against Union, winning 9-0 for their fourth straight victory. According to Caltabiano, "we didn't lose a set-- I think that puts it pretty succinctly how the match went."

On Wednesday, Callanan and Sawyer will travel to Salisbury State College in Maryland for the four-day Division III Nationals. The dynamic duo will be playing doubles, and Callanan will also compete in singles. The senior said he "expects a better performance in doubles." The doubles pair has sufferred their only loss to a team from Tufts, but came back to beat them at the NESCAC's.

Crew

The Dad Vail Championships in Philadelphia on Friday and Saturday were a great disappointment for both the men's and women's crews. None of the men's shells made it past the opening heats, and only the varsity women's eight progressed past the semis.

The varsity women's eight won their heat on Friday, finishing the 200 meter course in 7:10. "Our heat was really good because we beat Wesleyan after we had lost to them in the Little Three," said co-captain Penny Beach '87. On Saturday, they came in fourth in semis and qualified for the "petite finals." They came up a little short in the "petites," as their time of 7:27 was not enough to catch Mount Holyoke's 7:15. Coach Chris Cruz said that she was somewhat disappointed with finishing 10th in the 18 team field that was paced by Georgetown's winning effort.

Like their varsity counterparts, the novice women's eight won their heat on Friday with a time of 7:10. In the semis, however, they finished fifth in the seven team field in 7:25, nearly 20 seconds behind Purdue's winning time. The women's varsity four, composed primarily of novices, finished a very respectable fifth in the heats on Friday.

The varsity men, who got a very difficult draw, finished fourth in the heats on Friday behind Ithaca, Purdue, and Trinity. The JV also cruised to a fourth place finish in the heats, and the freshmen lightweights and heavyweights came in third in theirs.

— Chuck Samuelson

W. Lacrosse

The women's lacrosse team finished its season in fine form last Thursday, beating Union 19-13 on the road. The win puts its season record at 6-4.

The offense continued to dominate in this shootout, and the scoring was again well balanced as seven players netted goals for the Ephs. Co-captain Lee Wierdsma '87 led the way with four goals, and Gigi Madore '87 and Mara Burnett '88 each had hat tricks. Chris Boddicker '88, Amy Kershaw '90, and Mo Flaherty '90 all tallied two apiece, and Beth Bernheimer '88 added another.

Coach Chris Larson-Mason was very proud of her team this season, especially co-captains Wierdsma and Lee Briggs '87, who she said "did an outstanding job with the team this year." On not getting a playoff berth, she said, "we were a little disappointed, but we still had a good season. The teams we lost to were very tough, and had we played just a little better in two games, Tufts and Middlebury, things could have been a lot different. The top four teams go (to the playoffs), and we were fifth."

Larson-Mason was quick to point out the strong positive achievements of her squad, including a third consecutive Little Three title. She also praised a strong freshman class, including leading scorer Flaherty, on which to build for next year following the loss of seven seniors.

line drive to second.

As the season winds into the final week, the team batting leaders are Hedeman at .442 with 18 runs and 21 RBI's, Duquette at .371 with 25 runs and 13 stolen bases and Chris Pachus '88 at .352 with 24 runs and 22 RBI's. Barbera's Saturday pitching dropped his team-leading E.R.A. to 5.19.

Williams played Wesleyan yesterday. An Eph win would have created a three-way tie for the Little Three title; a Wesleyan win would have won it for them outright. Tomorrow, the Ephs travel to Pittsfield to play North Adams under the lights of the Pittsfield Cubs' Double A stadium.

Trackmen fourth at New England's meet

by Tom Fitzgibbon

Finishing in fourth place on Saturday at Worchester Polytechnical Institute, the men's track team did not quite reach its lofty early season goal of winning the Division III New England Championships. However, as is so common with 'we could have' seasons, injuries hurt this Eph squad at the crucial time. Nonetheless, fourth place out of 26 teams was respectable considering the number of athletes that were able to compete. The final standings saw only WPI (86), Brandeis (76) and MIT (51) ahead of the Ephs (44), and all had more of their qualifying athletes healthy and in attendance.

The jumping events are a traditional stronghold for the Ephs, and Saturday was no exception. Brandt Johnson '87 led the way with his third consecutive New England Division III high jump title. His winning jump was 6'9", just 1/2" short of his own meet record. His performance earned him a trip to the Nationals in Chicago. Henry Jones '88 also had a fine day, gathering two pieces of hardware by taking third place in both the long (20'11") and triple (45'6") jumps. Ken Alleyne '88 skied to a second place finish in the Eph dominated long jump with a leap of 21'6 3/4".

On the track, the 4x100 meter relay team of Pierre Swart '90, Scott Powers '88, Jon Horton '90 and Lars Hem '90 was in second

Rugby falls to Amherst

by Jonathan Hollenberg

Coming off a culturaly stimulating practice on Friday night, the Williams Rugby and Football Club seemd fully prepared to conquer all in the Little Three Tourney held on Saturday at Amherst. The white dogs of Williams were united as one in their desire to end this successful season with a resounding triumph over rivals Amherst and Wesleyan.

Due to a scheduling impropriety, the A-side was forced to play Wesleyan first, only to receive 30 minutes of recuperation time before entering the final conflict with a fresh Lord Jeff side. After failing behind 4-0 to the Cardinals, the WRFC woke up and took control of the game behind two scores by scrum captain Jeff Heilman '87 and single tallies by Mike Goldstein '88 and Sean Brennan '87. Mike Merriam '87 added two conversions to seal a 20-4 trouncing of Wesleyan.

The rewards of victory could not be savored, for the most important game of the year was soon to commence. After the Lord Jeffs jumped out to an early 3—0 lead, Evan Zahner '87 pounded his way to the try zone on a specially designed penalty play. Merriam then scored on a penalty kick to make the score 7—3. The Lord Jeffs capitalized on the A-side's physical exhaustion by scoring two tries and a penalty kick to take a 14—7 lead.

The white dogs failed to let up as Merriam continued his stellar kicking performance by converting on two penalties and with less than five minutes to play, Williams was down by a point, 14—13.

'Scissors' play

The scrum, led by seniors Davis Fulkerson, Gene Masarro, and juniors Nils Cristofferson and Tom Higgiins drove deep into the Amherst zone. The white dogs opted to run the "scissors" as the referee awarded the Ephs a penalty from three yards out. The run failed but Williams had another chance to redeem themselves with a five meter scrum down. At this point the referee made the controversial call of delay of game on Williams, giving Amherst the ball, and the game as time soon ran out.

After the whistle, the white dogs showed their sportsmanship by taking off their beloved white jerseys and giving them to the victors. In a turn of events the Little Three crown went unclaimed when, in the final

Panthers oust laxmen

by Marc McDermott

Despite losing its last two games, the men's lacrosse team ended their season on a positive note, said tri-captain Jamie Gallop '87. The Ephs suffered through a marathon final week in which Gallop led his team to consecutive 8-7 victories over Connecticut College and Tufts only to fall 14-7 to Middlebury in the East Coast Athletic Conference tournament semifinals before dropping their final game to Hamilton, 15-11.

The game aginst Tufts was the highpoint of the season. The Jumbos had defeated Williams earlier in the year in a stunning come-from-behind 7-6 victory and were going into the first round of the ECAC tourney as clear favorites, being seeded third as oppossed to the Ephs' sixth. But Williams was riding a tidal wave of momentum after having having beaten Connecticut College in triple overtime less than twenty-four hours earlier.

In a replay of their first game against Tufts, the Ephs jumped out to an early lead as freshman Bobby Santry pumped in two of his game-leading three goals to pace Williams to a 3-0 advantage in the first. Although Tufts cradled their way to five second quarter goals, Williams led 6-5 at the half and never looked back as excellent defense and freshman Rob Lambert's 16 saves held back the Jumbo's comeback bid.

Camels fall

Williams showed some impressive comeback ability itself in its victory over Conn. Coll. The Camels led 7-5 with only three minutes left in regulation when the Ephmen exploded for two goals, knotting the game at seven when sophomore Doug Gilbert flipped to Santry, who sent the game into overtime with a rocket to the net. Nine minutes and two sudden death overtimes later, Gilbert roped in the game winner unassisted. Santry finished the game with a pair of goals and three assists, giving him eight points in only two days.

The Ephmen had only one day of rest before hitting the road again, traveling to Middlebury for their semifinal contest against the second-seeded Panthers. Middlebury, who had defeated Williams 17-8 the week before, pounced on the weary Ephmen, opening the game with five first period goals and then coasting on to win, eliminating Williams from tournament play.

"They're more talented than we," explained Gallop "they had the referees and the crowd on their side and it was our third game in four days, but we played well and Coach Lamb told us he was proud of us"

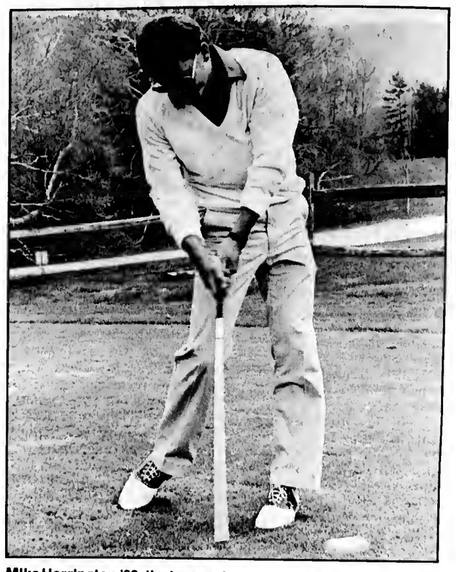
Golfers snare Little 3 crown

by Ted Ruger



As they entered the Little Three championships last Wednesday, members of the Williams golf team had compiled a rather mediocre season record with disappointing outings in the New England's and New England Small College Athletic Conference tournaments. None of that seems to matter, however, as the Ephs routed both Amherst and Wesleyan to capture the Little Three title and put a successful cap on the 1987 season.

Most impressive about the victory were the facts that the victory took place on the Lord Jeffs' home course and snapped a five-year winning streak for Amherst.

The tournament was divided into two halves, the first part consisting of a scotch doubles competition with each team fielding four pairs. In the scotch format, players alternate shots throughout the round, compiling one score for each pair. Each Williams duo competed with pairs from both the Jeffs and Cardinals. One point was awarded for a victory, and a tie was worth half a point. The Ephs captured six of the possible eight points in this part of the competition.

Head-to-head

In the afternoon, the tournament shifted to a head-to-head match with each team's number one player playing in a threesome against the other schools' top players, the number twos playing against each other, and so forth. Williams also dominated this segment, scoring 12 1/2 points for a tournament total of 18 1/2, 5 1/2 ahead of second-place Amherst.

Drop to 7-10

Fielding plagues baseball

by Stewart Verdery

The inconsistency of the baseball team surfaced again this past weekend. After splitting games on Saturday with a tough Wesleyan squad, the Ephs committed seven errors Sunday in a 19-9 loss to Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute as their record dropped to 7-10 up north and 8-17 overall.

Against R.P.I., Williams struck for four runs in the top of the first, as Rick Hedeman capped the outburst with a two-run homer off Engineer pitcher Kirby Pickett. For Hedeman, it was his third dinger in two days and enhanced his chances for post-season honors. According to Coach Jim Briggs, "Rick has a real shot to be first-team All New-England," a team which will be announced next week.

But while Williams was held scoreless over the next four innings, R.P.I. picked up 13 runs. Six errors in three innings did little to help, and though Williams scratched for four runs, two on a Jim Duquette '88 triple, the outcome was inevitable, with the final margin of 19-9.

'Rocket' fires Ephs

In the opener of the Wesleyan doubleheader, Williams sophomore Chris "Rocket" Conway stole the show. He scattered five hits over the seven-inning affair in becoming the first Eph to go the distance this season. The game was tied 2-2 going into the sixth, when the Ephs scored five runs. Hedeman launched his second homer of the game to start things, and Lew Collins '88 finished the rally with a two-run single. Scott Kennedy '89 drove in two more in the seventh, and Conway closed out the game with an uneventful seventh as Williams took the 11-3 contest.

Looking for a sweep that would put the Ephs in the driver's seat for the Little Three title, Williams sent sophomore Mike Barbera to the hill. He responded with a fine game, walking no one and yielding no earned runs. However, the fielding and batting was subpar in back of him. Seven errors were responsible for all five Wesleyan runs, and Williams left twelve runners on base in a 5-2 loss.

Earlier in the week, the Ephs dropped two games to Union and North Adams. The Union matchup was baseball at its best, as Williams fought for nine innings to overcome an early Dutchmen lead against the best pitcher they had seen all year in Rich Bartosch. Trailing 5-1 going into the sixth, the Ephs picked up two on a Steve Belsito '87 single and Hedeman's sacrifice fly. When Belsito added an RBI single in the eighth, the Ephs closed to 5-4. But they stranded two runners in the eighth and lost a chance in the ninth when the tying run was doubled off first on Duquette's

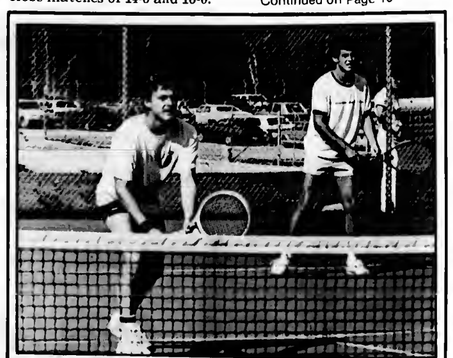
Destroy Dartmouth

WWRFC splits in 'Ball'



by Steph Jacon

The 5th annual Ball of Inverness took place on Saturday on the parched plains of Cole Field as the Williams Women's Rugby and Football Club battled two worthy opponents in Dartmouth and Middlebury. Good, hard and physical rugby characterized all five games that the Williams ruggers played. The A, B and C-sides, while losing several players to injuries, all held their Midd opponents scoreless with tallies of 20-0, 22-0, and 18-0, respectively. The Big Green from Hanover, however, defeated the A and B-sides in close matches of 14-0 and 10-0.

The A-side completely dominated play in their first match against the Panthers. Explosive Sonja Lengnick '88 opened the try floodgates in the opening minute as she picked up a loose ball from a ruck and dove into the try zone to make the score 4-0. Williams never let Middlebury past the midfield mark for the rest of the half. The white pack spoiled a plethora of Middlebury scrumdowns and lineouts and was the key to Williams' continuous ball possession.

The second half saw the Williams line unleash a scoring fury of three trys. Senior stand-

Commence

The finish line — or the starting line, depending on your point of view — is located somewhere on the lawn in front of Jesup Hall this morning.

Williams College's 198th Commencement begins at 10 o'clock. President Francis Oakley will award bachelor's degrees to 520 seniors. Oakley will also present master's degrees to graduate students in art history and to Fellows of the Center for Development Economics.

Alak Chakravorty, of New Dehli, India, the highest ranking student, will deliver the valedictory address.

Thomas Perkins of Schenectady, N.Y., is the Phi Beta Kappa speaker. Robert M. Wieman of Wantagh, N.Y., was chosen by his classmates as class speaker.

Meg Greenfield, a Pulitzer Prize-winning editor at the Washington Post, will address the graduates. Greenfield and five others will be awarded honorary degrees.

Oakley will award the Dewey Prize to one of the student speakers. Three judges, Michael Bell, professor and chairman of the English department, William Ryan, president of the Society of Alumni, and E. Wayne Wilkins Jr., a college trustee, will select the winner on the basis of composition and delivery.

The commencement ceremony will close a busy weekend of events for seniors.

Last night, the Baccalaureate service began with a procession at 4:45 p.m. The interfaith service was led by Rev. Carol Pepper, Chaplain to the College; Rabbi Alan L. Berg and Rev. Augustine Graap, associate chaplains; College Comptroller Saeed Mughal; and Abdul Manaf, a Fellow at the Center for Development Economics.

Editor Greenfield, historian Davis address seniors

Meg Greenfield, the editorial page editor of The Washington Post and a Pulitzer Prize winner, will address the 198th Williams commencement today with a speech entitled "The Universal Journalist."

Last night, Natalie Z. Davis, Henry Charles Lea Professor of History at Princeton University and President of the American Historical Association, asked, "Why Join the Procession" in her remarks at the Baccalaureate Service in Chapin Hall.

Both speakers will receive honorary degrees this morning — Greenfield a Doctor of Humane Letters, and Davis a Doctor of Letters.

Greenfield joined The Washington Post in 1968, and was appointed deputy editor of the editorial page in 1969. She was awarded a Pulitzer Prize for editorial writing in 1978, and in 1979 became editor of the editorial page.

Since 1974, Greenfield has written a biweekly column for Newsweek, covering a broad range of national and international events and issues.

Before joining the Post, Greenfield was Washington bureau chief of Reporter magazine, where she started in 1957 as a researcher. In 1961 she became a correspondent for the magazine, and in 1965 was appointed Washington editor.

Meg Greenfield

Greenfield graduated summa cum laude from Smith College in 1952, and spent the following year as a Fulbright Scholar at Cambridge University, England. She is a member of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

Davis, who specializes in the history of early modern France, has focused her research on the social and cultural history of 16th century France. She is particularly interested in the lives and values of peasants, artisans and women, as well as their relation to other social groups and to power, property and authority.

Consultant for "Martin Guerre"

Davis was the historical consultant for the French film, "The Return of Martin Guerre." The archival details she discovered during her research for the movie, and her sense that the whole story could not be analyzed fully in a film, led her to write a book of the same name, published in 1983 by Harvard University Press and since translated into four languages.

Davis' newest book, "Fiction in Archives: Pardon Tales and their Tellers in Sixteenth-Century France," will be published next fall by Stanford University Press, with a French translation released by Editions du Seuil.

Davis was educated at Smith College, Radcliffe College, and the University of Michigan, from which she received her doctorate in 1959. She has taught at Brown University, the University of Toronto (where she was one of the founders of the journal "Renaissance and Reformation"), the University of California at Berkeley, and the Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales in Paris.

Natalie Z. Davis

Since 1978, she has taught at Princeton University. This spring she is Henry Luce Visiting Professor at the Whitney Humanities Center, Yale University.

Davis has been awarded honorary degrees from the Universite de Lyon II as well as several American institutions.

Four others, including college's Lewis, get honorary degrees

In addition to the awards bestowed on the weekend's major speakers, Washington Post editor Meg Greenfield and Natalie Davis, a Princeton University historian (see article elsewhere in this issue), the Doctor of Science Degree will be awarded to Koji Nakanishi, while Doctor of Laws degrees will be awarded to Douglas Ensminger, W. L. Hadley Griffin and Stephen R. Lewis.

Koji Nakanishi is Centennial Professor of Chemistry at Columbia University. He has done extensive research in areas of chemistry associated with the eye, including retinal proteins and isolation, structural and bio-organic studies of bioactive compounds.

Nakanishi, who was born in Hong Kong, received a B.Sc. degree from Nagoya University in 1947 and earned a Ph.D. in chemistry there in 1954. He taught at several universities in Japan before joinig the chemistry department at Columbia University in 1969. Nakanishi was named Centennial Professor in 1980. He has received many awards for his research.

Douglas Ensminger, is Emeritus Professor of Rural Sociology at the University of Missouri, Columbia. An expert in the field of agricultural development, Ensminger spent the years 1951 to 1970 as the Ford Foundation's Representative in India. In the position, he helped to develop practical programs aimed at alleviating the problems of hunger, poverty and population. He also served as a consultant to the Indian government on all phases of agriculture, rural development, family planning, rural enterprises and rural women in development.

Ensminger earned a B.S. degree in rural sociology in 1934 from the University of Missouri, and earned a Ph.D. in rural sociology in 1939 from Cornell University. He joined the University of Missouri faculty in 1970, and has since focused on a number of projects related to food production and population.

W. L. Hadley Griffin, is Chairman of the Executive Committee and a director of Brown Group, Inc. He retired as Chairman of the Board in 1985. Griffin, a 1940 graduate of Williams, served on the college Board of Trustees from 1975 to 1980. He is active in St. Louis civic organizations. He served as Chairman of the United Way fund drive in 1972 and as President of the organization the following year.

Griffen earned a law degree from Washington University in 1947 and joined Wohl Shoe Co., which later merged with Brown Shoe Co., as legal counsel. He became president of Brown Shoe Co. in 1968 and chief executive officer the following year. He became the Chairman of the Board, President and Chief Executive Officer of The Brown Group, Inc., at its formation in 1972.

In February, Stephen R. Lewis Jr. was named president of Carleton College. Lewis has been Herbert H. Lehman Professor of Economics at Williams since 1976, and was chairman of the department from 1984-86.

Lewis has been an administrator at Williams. He served as College Provost in the late 1960's and again in the mid-1970's. He was Special Assistant to President John Chandler in 1979-80.

Lewis, who graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Williams in 1960, returned as an assistant professor of economics in 1966, after earning a Ph.D. from Stanford in 1963. An expert on economic policy and planning in developing countries, he has held long-term advisory positions in Pakistan, Kenya and particularly Botswana. In 1982, Botswana's president awarded the Presidential Order of Meritorious Service to Lewis, the first American to receive that country's highest civilian honor.

Eleven receive Masters of Arts

Eleven men and women will receive Master of Arts degrees today for their work in the college's Graduate Program in the History of Art, which is offered in collaboration with the Clark Art Institute.

The honorary title of Robert Sterling Clark Fellow, a recognition of scholarly achievement, is usually bestowed on one M.A. candidate each year, said Charles Parkhurst, acting director of the program. This year, he said, two candidates have earned the distinction:

• Diana L. Linden of Great Neck, N.Y., who came to Williams from Harpur College of the State University of New York at Binghampton. Linden will seek a position in museum education and will continue to study elsewhere toward a Ph.D.

• Thomas E. Lippy, Jr., of Hampstead, Md., who received prior training in art history at Texas Christian University. Lippy has accepted an internship at the Peggy Guggenheim Collection in Venice. He plans to continue graduate study toward a Ph.D. thereafter.

Also receiving Master of Arts degrees today are Joyce R. Hu of Morrill, Maine; Pamela A. Ivinski of Morrisville, N.Y.; Denise A. Krieger of Hillsborough, Calif.; Thomas H. McGrath of Liberty, N.Y.; Scott Opler of Hinsdale, Ill.; Pamela A. Patton of Indiana, Pa.; Xia Qiu of Shanghai, China; Robin Reynolds of Andover, Mass.; and Charles E. Wylie of New York, N.Y.

CDE grants 20 degrees

Twenty men and women from 13 nations will receive graduate degrees in developmental economics at today's commencement, the Center for Development Economics (CDE) announced last week.

The majority of CDE's students hold positions in business and government in developing nations. CDE's program focuses on the economic problems and decisions these nations face.

The degree recipients will include Mohammad Alam of Bangladesh, Rescina Bhagwani of the Philippines, Sang Duck Chung of Korea, Stephen Njoroge Maina of Kenya, Abdul Manaf of Indonesia, Ambakisye Mtawa of Tanzania, George Ndegwa of Kenya, Kasirim E. Nwuke of Nigeria, Edward Thabo Nyepetsi of Lesotho, and Paul Elisha Olang of Kenya.

Also receiving degrees will be Dong-Suk Park of Korea, Ana Maria Rodriguez of Colombia, Tahir Sajjad of Pakistan, Khondoker Abdus Sami and Md. Abdus Samad Sarker, both of Bangladesh, Boljane Seakarea of Botswana, Mohammad Asif Sheikh of Pakistan, Ahmet Haluk Surel of Turkey, Cecilia Tanchoco of the Philippines, and Suranan Wongvithayakamjorn of Thailand.

Four teachers win 1987 Olmsted Prizes

Each year, four Olmsted Prizes are awarded to high school teachers nominated by members of the senior class. The prizes, which recognize general excellence in teaching, were established in 1984 through the estate of George Olmsted, Jr., '24.

The prize winners this year are Judith Jordan of Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn, N.Y.; John P. Matthias of Fortuna Union High School, Fortuna, Calif.; Terry A. Taylor, Ellsworth J. Wilson High School, Spencer, N.Y.; and Mercille Wisakowsky, Alamo Heights High School, San Antonio, Texas.

'87 officers are elected

The Class of 1987 has chosen the class officers who will represent them as alumni. They are President Paul A. Rardin of Philadelphia, Pa.; Vice President Elizabeth A. Andersen of Muskegon, Mich.; Secretary David R. Paulsen of Wausau, Wis.; and Treasurer Stephen A. Belsito of Millbury, Mass.

The senior class has also elected two Class Marshals, Elizabeth V. Briggs of Williamstown, and Gregory F. Lang of Darien, Conn., and a Class Speaker, Robert M. Wieman of Wantagh, NY. The officers' duties began yesterday at Class Day, and continue until the class' first official reunion, five years from now.

Rardin, a music major, takes on the presidential responsibilities of arranging and presiding over class events, recommending classmates for various College purposes, and appointing other class representatives such as class historian and class poet.

Vice President Andersen, a history major, will be involved in arranging class events and will preside over them in Rardin's absence, and will be expected to carry out special arrangements on request.

As Secretary, Paulsen, a double major in history and American studies, will collect information about his classmates, and will write it up four times a year for publication in the Williams Alumni Review.

Treasurer Belsito, an economics major, will collect and disburse funds as needed for reunions or other class events.

Class Marshals Briggs, an art major, and Lang, an English major, will lead the class in the traditional Commencement procession today.

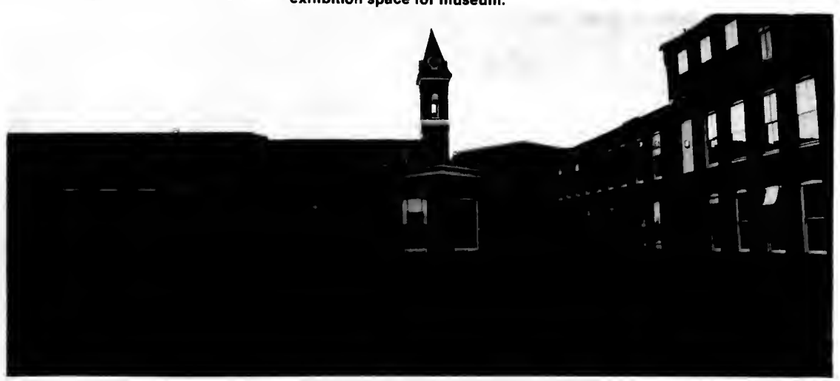
The selling of MASS MoCA moves to Boston; price is $35 million

by John McDermott

Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA), has sold his idea to college administrators. He has sold it to the mayor of North Adams. He has sold it to an Italian art collector and to a German museum director. He has even sold it, apparently, to Governor Michael S. Dukakis.



But his next customer may be the toughest of all. The idea — that a massive North Adams mill be transformed into a museum of modern art and architecture — is now before the Massachusetts Senate, and has yet to reach the House.

The fate of the proposal, Krens acknowledged last week, rests on a $35 million grant which planners hope the Senate Ways and Means Committee will include in a convention center package bill.

At a press conference with Krens Monday, College President Francis Oakley praised the concept, as did North Adams Mayor John Barrett 3d, who said Krens first told him of the idea about 14 months ago.

The site of the proposed museum is Sprague Electic Company's Marshall Street plant, a complex of 28 buildings on 13 acres of land. The museum would be accompanied by a convention center and commercial space.

Site of layoffs in 1985

Krens said current estimates of the cost of converting the plant range from $66 to $72 million. He said he expects an announcement within several weeks on whether the Sprague's parent company, Penn Central Corp., will donate the property for the museum.

Once considered the city's lifeblood industry, the Marshall Street plant is now better known for the hundreds of workers it laid off, beginning in 1985. The last of Sprague's operations will be transferred out in July.

The plant has roughly 720,000 square feet of interior space. About 435,000 square feet would be occupied by the museum, making it, according to WCMA, the third largest museum of art in the United States, and the largest contemporary art museum.

The proposed museum has a name, the "Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art and Museum of Contemporary Architecture," and an acronym, "Mass. MoCA."

Owned by a non-profit "cultural development corporation," which would accept funds from state, federal and private sources, the museum would be operated by the WCMA, which would also provide works of art, Krens said.

No college funds sought

Oakley said that no college funds will be involved in the project, a stipulation which he said has been in place since Krens' earliest conceptions.

The college museum announced it has reached preliminary agreements with Giuseppe Panza, a collector of 1960s and 1970s American art, and with the German Architecture Museum of Frankfurt, for long-term loans of their collections — if Mass. MoCA becomes a reality.

Krens said the WCMA has also asked 30 to 40 artists about donations of their works to the museum.

The Governor's support has increased legislators' awareness of the Mass. MoCA proposal. Krens said Dukakis visited the site last August — six months before the proposal was first reported.

But Krens acknowledged that a delay by the Senate could threaten the entire project. "The window of opportunity is right now. It's a perfect time," he said. "I don't know if we would be able to sustain the anxiety for another year."

Governor Dukakis visited museum site in August, 1986.

Faculty reject contract minor

by Peter Balaban

At their May 13 meeting, the faculty rejected a proposal by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) to allow students to negotiate minors.

Secretary of the Faculty Meredith Hoppin said the vote was roughly 47 to 37 against the contract minor proposal. The proposal would have allowed departments to grant "minor" status to students who completed a package of courses they selected from within a departmental major.

Earlier in the meeting, the faculty defeated an amendment requiring departments choosing not to offer contract minors to justify the policy before the CEP.

Under the CEP proposal, departments were not required to agree to contract minors. Political Science professor Kurt Tauber, who introduced the amendment, said last week that he would have preferred making contract minors ...aliable in all departments, but realized this was impractical in such highly structured and sequential departments as Mathematical Sciences.

Advising time an issue

Hoppin said the main objection to the contract minor was that it would require too much advising time, since each proposal would need a professor's approval.

But Tauber said he thought of the advising time as an asset, not a drawback, because the contractual process outlined in the proposal would "force faculty and students together in a genuinely educational discussion."

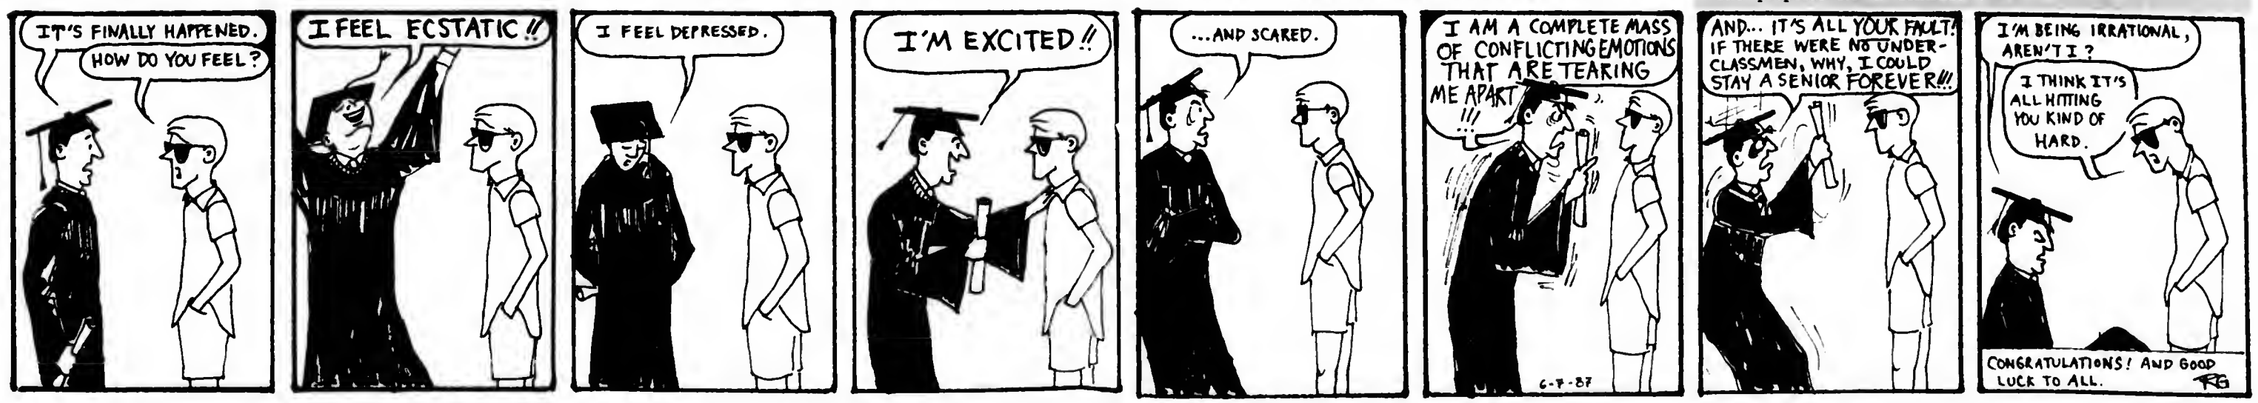
He said the measure's failure "might very well have to do with reasons other than education."

The proposal for a contract minor was introduced by the CEP at a faculty meeting on April 29, but was sent back to the committee for further review after history professor Thomas Spear suggested it be amended to allow "minors" to be awarded for work in interdepartmental programs, which currently grant students "concentration" status.

Professor Thomas Jorling, the chairman of CEP, said the committee met between the April 29 and May 13 faculty meetings to discuss Spear's amendment. Jorling said CEP opposed it because members saw concentrations as structured, pre-established curricula, incompatible with the contract-minor format.

Disputed conversation

Also during the interval, Jorling said, he talked with Spear, who chairs the African and Middle Eastern Studies Committee, and with the heads of other interdepartmental programs that offer concentrations. He said two of the chairs told him they strongly opposed the Spear amendment.



But Spear said Jorling did not speak with him between the two meetings, and added that he did not believe Jorling consulted any chairs of interdepartmental committees.

IN OTHER BUSINESS, the faculty approved a calendar for the academic year 1989-90. Like next year's calendar, it will include a week-long Thanksgiving break and a fall reading period of three days.

The approval came despite criticism of the schedule by the College Council and the Garfield Republican Club. Hoppin said the new format will be evaluated after two years.

Members of the Williams Choral Society performed "Fatiha," a piece commissioned for the service, and composed by visiting Choral Society conductor, Jonathan Green. They also performed "Cantique de Jean Racine," a motet by Gabriel Faure traditionally sung at the Williams Baccalaureate Service.

During "Class Day" yesterday, was the induction of seniors into two academic honor societies, Phi Beta Kappa and Sigma Xi. There was an afternoon reception at the President's house and a party in the evening.

Also yesterday were the Ivy Exercises, which included the traditional planting of the ivy and the watch-dropping ceremony, with newly-elected Class President Paul Rardin, presiding. Dean of the College Stephen Fix presented awards, including the Olmsted prizes for secondary school teaching.

The ceremony included a review of the activites of the class over the past four years by Class Historians Averil Clarke of Laureiton, N.Y.; Martha Hoopes of Washington, D.C.; David Paulsen of Wausau, Wis.; John Schafer of Washington, D.C.; and Andrew Smith of Canton, Conn. Class Poets Paul Bach of Pittsfield; Monica Fennell of Evanston, Ill.; Devonya Havis of Baton Rouge, La. and Frank Huyler of Hendersonville, N.C. were each to read a short poem about their experiences at Williams. Leading the Class in an original Class Song were Class Songwriters Paul Rardin, Darca Boom of Eldridge, Iowa, and Feicia (Jacqui) Davis of Woburn, Mass.

The Ivy Exercises ended with an old Williams tradition—the dropping of a watch from the top of Thompson Memorial Chapel. According to legend, if the watch breaks the graduating seniors will have good luck. (The watch fell after the Record's presstime).

Two innovations of last year's commencement weekend were repeated yesterday. "Lightnight" featured illuminated buildings along Main Street and lights in and around Baxter Hall, as well as refreshments, music and dancing for seniors and their families and friends.

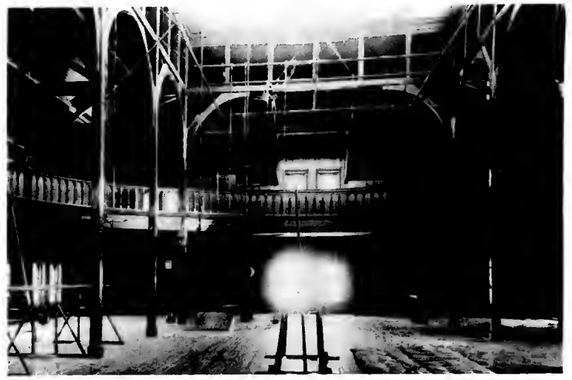
Trustees depart from 'advocacy'

The finance committee of the Board of Trustees departed from its policy of "disinvestment advocacy" recently — on a recommendation from the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR).

The departure occured when the trustee committee declined to support a shareholder resolution urging Merck & Co., a pharmaceutical firm, to withdraw its operations from South Africa, said College Treasurer William Reed, who serves as Secretary to the trustees.

The finance committee's decision followed a deadlock on the shareholder proxy at an April ACSR meeting. Three ACSR members supported the proxy and three opposed it, Reed said.

(It is the ACSR's policy not to reveal how individual members vote, Reed has maintained).



Reed said the primary reason for the three members' opposition was that the company is the sole producer of certain medical drugs. He said he did not know whether those drugs depend on raw materials from South Africa.

Merck & Co. has 289 employees in South Africa, and is listed in category I under the Sullivan Principles, which places it among the companies "making good progress" in opposing apartheid and employing blacks, according to a newsletter of the Investor Responsibility Research Center, Inc.

It was the only case this year, Reed said, in which the trustees did not follow their self-imposed policy of supporting proxies which call for disinvestment.

Sports Year in Review

The wrestling team made significant improvement. They beat Dartmouth, and Mark Duff qualified for the Division III nationals. With a number of quality freshmen coming back, the grapplers should continue to improve. Coach Joe Dailey departs to Salisbury State, as does senior star Dan MacDonell.

The track teams also won Little Three titles. The women were led by sophomore do-everything star Dawn Macauley. Distance runners Becky Conklin, Susan Gray and Jen Morris also were consistent performers. For the men, Goeff Igharo and Andre Lopez dominate opponents, and seniors Jon Fisher and "Space" Grossman outlaped people in the distance events.

Spring

Unlike the winter, the spring brought no ECAC championships for any Eph squads but fans were treated to a NESCAC championship by the tennis team, an ECAC semifinal playoff appearance for the men's lacrosse squad, and Little Three victories by the golf, men's and women's track, softball, and women's lacrosse teams. On the other side of the coin, the major disappointment of the season was the men's baseball squad, finishing well under .500 after last year's 19-11 season.

The most successful team of the spring was with no doubt the men's tennis squad. The Ephs capped an 8-2 season with an improbable NESCAC championship, delivered only because all the doubles teams won their flights, and Marc Caltabiano '90 won the tourney, both in singles and doubles, without losing a set.

Also scorching opponents, but by aiming balls into the net instead of over them, was the women's lax team. Junior Mara Burnett spearheaded the offensive effort and with a fine crop of freshman this squad can look only to improve.

After a splendid '86 spring and a returning offensive attack that made the Red Sox look like the Bad News Bears, the Eph hardballers fell on hard times this year with a horrific spring trip in which it played only Div. I squads and went 1-7. Coming north was not the remedy the players hoped for, however; the squad played mediocre ball for the rest of the way. Standing out on the up side was the other half of the current Hedeman athletic dynasty. Rick Hedeman, at first base, ended up with a .450 batting average and four home runs to pace the attack for coach Jim Briggs' troops.

The men's lax team again qualified for the ECAC's, falling to Middlebury in the semifinals. The team failed to win the Little Three, but still had a good year. Seniors Mike O'Connell, Steve Patterson, Jim Sperry, Taylor Watts, Jamie Gallop, and Dan McCarthy will be heading on, but talent remains. Freshman Bobby Santry led the Ephs in scoring and classmate Rob Lambert played well in goal after an injury to Dana Weeder.

The softballers took the first Little Three crown en route to a 5-4 season. Nancy Hedeman pitched every inning of every game and was helped out by seniors Tory Ballard and Kathy Oehling and underclasswomen Lori Schaen and Missy Crouchley.

The ruggers lost the Little Three after a dubious call versus Amherst, but destroyed Wesleyan 20-4. A lot of guys leave, but the B-siders showed much talent this year. Of course, the 'White Dogs' had a good time in the postgame festivities. The women's team didn't have a chance to take a title, but all three sides did shutout Middlebury. Star Mary Petersen will depart, as will a number of other seniors.

The crew teams had mediocre seasons, failing to beat a Wesleyan boat that was one of the best in New England. The Dad Vail Championships didn't turn out that great either, as no boats reached the finals.

The trackmen, on the other hand, took the Little Three and the NESCAC's behind stars Andre Lopez, Pierre Swart, Jon Fisher, and "Space" Grossman. Hoopsters Brandt Johnson and Henry Jones also earned points for departing coach Richard Farley.

The women, led by Dawn Macauley and Karlyn McNall, also won the Little Three. Distance runners dominated for the women.

The golf squad took the Little Three after a disappointing finish in the NESCAC's. "Spike" Frechette qualified for nationals and will lead returnees Mike Harrington, Ian Lapey, and Jeff Heuer among others. Seniors Guy Kurtz, Chas Foehl, Don Dagnoli, and Tim Sullivan will exit the instruction of coach Rick Pohle.

Eph teams' 1986-87 performances reviewed

Fall

The fall season was one in which no one team stood out, in terms of record or playoff performance, save one: the women's volleyball team. While the football team showed promise behind the arm of sophomore transfer Scott Kennedy and a slew of backfield talent in the likes of Mike McGlaughlin '89, Todd Streiter '90, Jon Horton '90, it nonetheless finished with a 4-4 record and a Little Three second place finish behind Amherst.

Similarly, the men's soccer team had an iffy season, especially compared with its enormous successes of the past few years. Nonetheless, the squad finished at 8-4-2 and nailed a Little Three title with a 4-2 win at the Herst on the last day of the season.

Equalling their male counterparts in wins but eclipsing them in improvement was the women's soccer team, which made giant strides in the '86 campaign, doubling last season's win total. Chris Boddiker '88 continued her excellent play and has a shot at breaking the all-time scoring record for the Ephs. Gigi Madore '87 was also a major contributor for the 8-5-1 players.

As mentioned above, the women's volleyball team, behind the spikes of super-athlete wife Nancy Hedeman '89, and leadership of senior co-captains Caroline Teer and Becky Moehring, drove to a sparkling 24-10 season, marred only by a disappointing fourth place finish in the NIAC's. At one point in the season, the squad reeled off 13 wins in a row, clearly distinguishing themselves as the season's best Williams team.

Another outstanding fall squad was the women's field hockey squad, just missing qualification for the NIAC's despite a stellar season. The squad finished over .500 and had a good mix of young talent and experience in its explosive attack. Freshman Amy Kershaw and Mo Flaherty provided the scoring punch along with Sue Scarborough '87, Lisa Tenerowicz '88; goalie Wyn Holt tended the nets.

One of the most pleasant success stories of the fall was the brilliant showing of senior cross country runner Dave "Space" Grossman who led the harriers to their sixteenth Little Three win in the last seventeen years. Despite being pestered by Steve Brody '90, "Space" won the individual race with a time of 24:57, continuing the tradition of Williams running excellence.

One other individual success story for the fall was that of freshman tennis player Amy Davidson.

A.D. won the New Englands at the number two position, a slot she did not lose during all year. Behind her performance, the squad finished third at the tourney capping off a mediocre season with a bang.

The women harriers did not fare as well as their male trackmates, finishing second at the Little Three meet, seven points behind Wesleyan. Junior Anne Knott starred at the meet, finishing fifth, while other Williams scorers were Becky Conklin '87, Kate Pugh '87 and Sarah Pierce '88 and Anne Thompson '89.

Missing for the Ephs when they take to the gridion next fall will be football coach Bob Odell, who is retiring after a long and successful career at Williams. In his first decade here, the team won eight Little Three titles.

Winter

The highlight of the winter was no contest—the Eph hoop team swept past Babson, Amherst, and Framingham State to capture its first ECAC championship. Freshman point guard Garcia Major and junior Henry Jones provided the speed in the backcourt, and seniors Greg Lang and Brandt Johnson worked the boards, all to give Coach Harry Sheehy a chance to wear that pink tie in the postseason. Lang, Johnson, three-point specialist John Ciulla, and free-throw artist Dave Paulsen will be gone next year, but a tall freshman class should help out in 1987-88.

The men's hockey team improved somewhat, compiling a 7-13-2 record that included a 2-1 shocker over Division I Army. Defensemen Taylor Watts, John Booth and Tim McKone, forwards Chris Traggio, Denny Wright, Craig Cheevers and Mike O'Connell and goalie Rick Dietz graduate, but five of the top six scorers, including freshman Ron Van Belle and the sophomore line of Chris Conway, Will Putnam and Mike Swenson, will be back for Bill McCormick, who needs one more win for a total of 300 in his career.

The female skaters had their best year ever, winning nine of fifteen games. Junior goalie Daisy Hagey had a handful of shutouts. Junior Kirsten Rooks led the team in scoring and will return next year as the Ephwomen move up to varsity status.

The men's squash team got good coverage in The Record for a change and responded with a number seven national ranking. They won the Little Three as usual and lost ony four times in route to a 15-4 regular season record. Keith Goldfeld, Rick Hedeman, and Matt McCall will graduate, leaving things in the hands of underclassmen Wendell Chestnut, Lew Fisher, Doug Gilbert and Dana Weeder, among others.

The women squashers did pretty well also, ending with a number three ranking in New England Division III. Junior Jeanne Cloppse made the top twelve nationally again, and she'll be back along with Allison Buckner '89. Gone for Coach Renzie Lamb will be seniors Amy Barstad and Gigi Madore and sophomore Judy Kellog.

The swimmers left Muir Pool with a bang, as both squads won the Little Three and came in second in the New Englands. The men will lose Scott Robinson, Jim Jordan, Dean Pomerleau, and Beau Everett. Returnees for Coach Carl Samuelson include freshmen stars Dan Snyder, Rob Benson, and Chris Cierzo. The women will miss Joan Horgan, who was named the outstanding senior at the New Englands', Jen Raymond and diver Jen Campbell.

On the mountain, a pair of freshmen, J.P. Parisien and Lindon Seed, led the men's ski team, whose season was highlighted by a fourth place finish at the Williams Carnival. The downhillers were helped by the cross-country skiers who held their own at most carnivals. The women were paced by a crowd of sophomores, including Amy Duncombe, Monika Kopp, Mari Omland and Linda Glass. Kirsten Froburg and Kathy Wolf were the stars for the Nordic women.

The dramatic renaissance story came in the women's hoop team, which started off 6-0 and managed to glide through to a 14-8 finish. Sophs Nancy Hedeman and Missy Crouchley, as usual, were the big players for rookie coach Nancy Roberts. With virtually all of the team returning, next year holds the potential for the sweetest season.

The volleyball team split with Amherst, but the return of big guns Clark West and Winston Chang will give the Jeffs a rough time next year.

Seniors, faculty convocate

A. Bartlett Giamatti, the president of the National League and former president of Yale University spoke at Convocation on Saturday on "The State of the College Game."

Giamatti said a "cruel hoax" is played on athletes by some institutions "which make money of them, increase their fame because of them, and do not educate them."

"The NCAA is not entirely to blame for the sorry state of big time athletics," he said. "Nor does one properly blame television entirely. I place blame for these scandals on those who run the colleges and universities that give money to young people for the sole purpose of playing a sport for the commerical gain of the institution."

"When a presidents' commission of the NCAA was politically pummelled in public by the athletic directors and others who supposedly work for the presidents, the spectacle did not show academic leaders in this country to have either guts, or will, or many brains," he said.

Giamatti claimed that the criticisms of higher education levelled by Education Secretary William Bennett and others find credence with the public in large part because of the behavior of about ten percent of colleges and universities in regard to big time athletics.

"For two decades the American people have been aware of and dismayed by the great gap in the nation's colleges and universities between grand, traditional professions of high principle on the one hand and institutional behavior on the other that is often venal, self-serving, and morally shoddy," he said.

He said reform must come from within and contain at least three ingredients: the awarding of all undergraduate financial aid on a need basis, the disbanding of alumni or booster groups that contribute cash to students, and the declaring of freshmen ineligible for all varsity sports.

He urged pressure be put on these institutions to change since the scandals in big time athletics unnecessarily damage the public's image of all higher education.

"What was allowed to become a circus, college sports, threatens to become the means by which the public believes the whole enterprise is a sideshow," he said.

During the ceremony, college president Francis Oakley awarded Giamatti an honorary degree, stating, "For one who once claimed that all he ever wanted to be President of was the American League, your career has surely taken you to some strange places."

Oakley cited Joan Benoit Samuelson, winner of the first Olympic women's marathon for her "fabled toughness, firmness of will, and independence of spirit long charasteristic of your native Maine."

Dr. Tenley Albright, a figure skating champion and surgeon, received a Doctor of Laws. "During years of successful medical practice, and juggling the demands of family and career with the determination that has long been your hallmark," Oakley said, "You have somehow found time to lend your services also to a host of causes ranging from the President's Council on Physical Fit-

Dukakis likes Mass MoCA; House to vote on funding

by John McDermott

Governor Michael S. Dukakis this month endorsed a plan to convert a North Adams mill into a museum of contemporary art. The message comes before the state House, which reconvenes next week, considers a bill which may provide $35 million in state funds to create the museum.

The "Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art" would be the largest contemporary art museum in the world, according to Thomas Krens, the chief planner of the project and the director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA).

"With the help of our colleagues in the legislature," Dukakis said, "we're prepared to make a very strong and a serious commitment to this."

The planners of the project are seeking the $35 million under the Massachusetts Convention Centers Act, which was passed by the state Senate July 2, by a vote of 32 - 1.

Dukakis made the endorsement in a speech September 1 at the museum site, the now-empty Sprague Electric Co. plant. He addressed a crowd of 100 reporters and onlookers from a Williams College podium, brought in for the occasion.

Dukakis had privately offered support for the project, which originated with Williams, earlier than September 1, according to College Treasuer William S. Reed.

Dukakis said he was impressed by the speed with which Krens had assembled support for the project from the college, the city of North Adams and members of the legislature — and attracted the interest of major artists and architects.

Meanwhile, Krens said he was preparing to announce the long-term loans of two art collections which would rival the large collection of Count Giuseppe Panza, of Milan, announced in the spring.

"That would give us three of the best collections in the world," he said.

Return on investment

Dukakis said the museum's potential for economic development, as forecasted by Krens and other planners, was strong. "There's no question that in the long run, the investment we make will come back many, many times over, in the form of new jobs and new businesses and new economic enterprise."

Preceding Dukakis at the podium, College President Francis Oakley praised him for the state's commitment to higher education. "Williams is proud to respond to that encouragement," he said of the college's involvement.

On the day after Dukakis's visit, two members of his cabinet spent two hours touring the plant with Krens, area legislators, and a group of reporters.

Secretary of Administration and Finance Frank T. Keefe and Secretary of Economic Affairs Joseph Alviani did not endorse the project as Dukakis had, but Keefe described the Sprague plant as "the best mill site in Massachusetts."

Added Alviani, "I think we feel pretty confident that we have a very qualified group of people involved with this project."

Executive branch review

Keefe's office will review Mass. MoCA's application for the $35 million in state funds, which will be taken from the legislature's appropriation. Asked how long the state might deliberate on the project before deciding whether to approve it, his colleague Alviani said, "It need not be a very long or attenuated process."

North Adams Mayor John Barrett 3rd, who also took the tour, said the museum would be owned and controlled by a "cultural development corporation," whose board would prob-

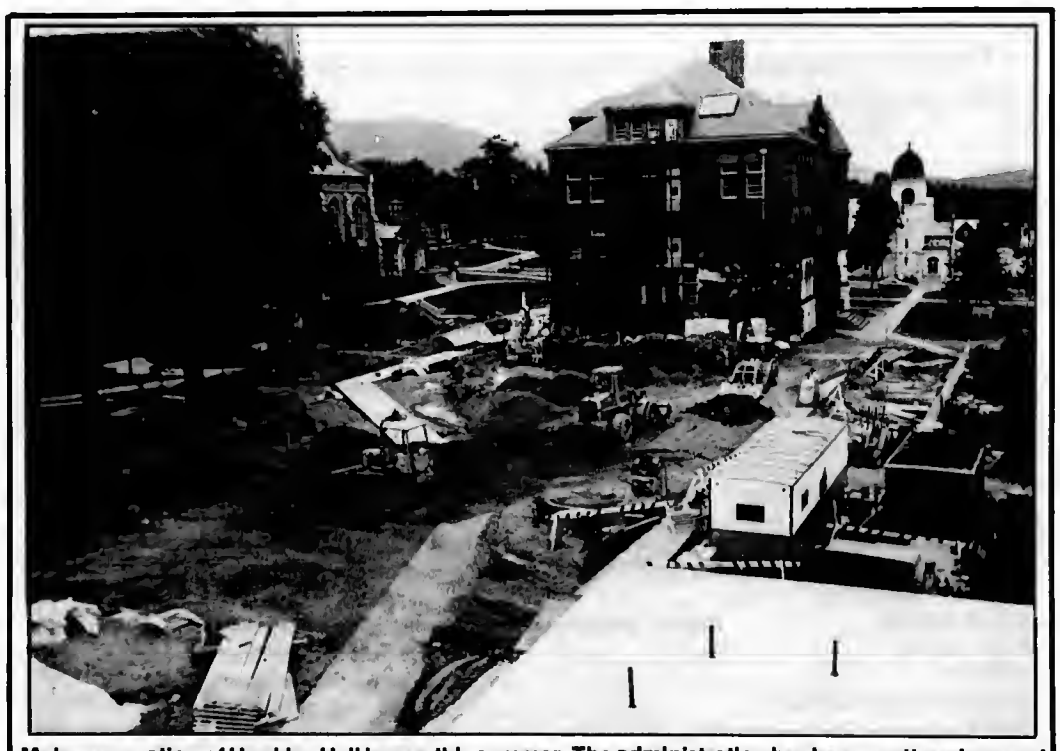
Oakley appoints Cook to head race relations board

by Debbie Snyder

College President Francis Oakley has named three professors, two administrators and five students to the Commission on Campus Race Relations. He announced the formation of the commission at last week's class meetings and faculty meeting.

Oakley established the commission in May, following the demand for the formation of a grievance committee in a letter from the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) to the administration in February.



Associate Professor of Political Science Timothy Cook will chair the commission. Members include Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta, professors Peter Berek of the English department and Jason Kuo of the Art department, Jo-Ann Gray-Murray of Admissions, Gail Covington '88, Rodney Cunningham '88, Farhan Haq '89, Cassandra Kirk '89, and Elyse Rosenblum '88. Oakley named Nancy McIntire, assistant to the president, and Carter Zinn '88, college council president, as liaisons to the administration and the college council, respectively.

Oakley charged the commission with four functions: "reviewing existing grievance procedures," "organizing an educational program for incoming freshmen," "mounting other activities or events during the course of the academic year designed to further the same end" and "acting as a resource for the Committee on Educational Policy as it reviews the responsiveness of our curriculum to minority experiences, achievements and concerns."

Oakley said he received about 20 student nominations by the College Council, WBSU and by individual students.

The committee has yet to meet, but members stressed the need for ways to improve the procedure for filing grievances. "It's of concern to students that if they voice a grievance against a professor, other black students are immediately implicated," Covington said. Cook said the commission will probably address the grievance procedure through subcommittees.

Oakley said that the commission has no deadlines for suggesting changes, and he expects it to continue its work for several years.

Major renovation of Hopkins Hall began this summer. The administration has been scattered around campus for an expected two years. (Albright)

Meeting Giamatti's Challenge

At Saturday's convocation, A. Bartlett Giamatti, president of the National Baseball League and former president of Yale, made some sweeping statements concerning the current disarray in college athletics. He denounced "big-time" college sports as commericalized and professionalized, and asserted that athletic programs should be "subject to the same scrutiny as all other departments" of the institution.

He placed the blame for the current sorry situation on members of the nation's academic leadership who, he said, "expect athletes to finish four years of their sport but not necessarily to graduate."

To address the problems plaguing college athletics, Giamatti offers three major remedies:

- College and universities should award all undergraduate financial aid on a need basis.
- They should disband alumni or booster groups which disperse cash to students and to athletics programs. Athletic programs, Giamatti argued, should be budgeted and controlled as rigorously as physics or French departments.
- Finally, freshmen should be declared ineligible to play varsity sports. Such ineligibility would "give (freshmen) a chance to be regular college students and allow them to make the transition to university life," Giamatti said.

Giamatti's contention that institutional behavior is often "venal, self-serving and morally shocking" is both insightful and provocative. Moreover, his statement that many academic programs threaten to engulf entire universities rings quite true.

We should, therefore, take Giamatti's proposals quite seriously. In general, they are thoughtful and could do a great deal of good — especially at the most competitive level of college sports, Division I-A. But they also may serve as standards to judge intercollegiate athletics here at Williams; we cannot assume that our athletic programs are exempt from all of the problems Giamatti describes.

Williams already awards financial aid on a need-only basis. We do, however, have booster organizations for certain sports, such as the Sixth Man club for basketball. Williams should re-evaluate the role of these booster clubs, and determine whether or not they foster a respect for the balance between athletics and education, or instead breed favoritism toward the athletic department.

Giamatti's proposal to bar freshmen from varsity sports raises intriguing questions that deserve careful examination by the "big time" athletic programs of many Division I schools. Division III athletic programs, however, are not subject to the same commercial and professional pressures as their Division I counterparts, and it seems unncessary to take such a drastic step at Williams.

In general, athletics at Williams are played, managed, and nurtured in direct conjunction with the academic requirements of the college. Giamatti's speech, however, should remind us that many colleges do not enjoy the precarious balance between athletics and academics that Williams is so fortunate to possess. We would do well to remain ever vigilant in protecting that balance, and we should not shrink from the difficult task of re-evaluating our own institution.

The New Patriotism's luster erodes with new challenges

by John Canty '88

With some other Williams students, this past summer I lived in Washington. At night we would argue the Gulf and the mullahs, we would debate and assess Ollie'n'Poindexter, we (well, I would) gaze at Fawn. These activities passed countless pleasant hours, yet at some point in mid-July, I remembered that there was supposed to be a President here in Washington. Where was he? Like UFO sightings, after scrutiny Ronald Reagan's name would sporadically find its way into the morning paper. Some days he might even talk. Yet, as a voice on the national stage, his is one increasingly dull and tepid.

And this is the greatest disappointment to some of us — and I am one — who had once looked to him and found purposeful leadership. With a couple of honorable exceptions, President Reagan since 1985 has abdicated the responsibility over defining the American agenda that we expect from our good Presidents. His failure to be inspiring or innovative or relevant is not merely personal; it owes to a larger problem of vision — the bankruptcy of the so-called New Patriotism.

This sense of frustrated expectations is keen with Ronald Reagan. At a time when many among our most learned scholars confessed doubt that the Presidency and the very institutions of our Republic could work, the Reagan Presidency began. Early on, it was nothing if not ambitious in purpose, decisive in execution.

Friend or foe of the President's agenda will concede that in its first term, the White House seemed to thrive on challenge. Reagan articulately advanced a program of action and stood fast to ideas that were frequently unpopular and in conflict with convention. At home that meant for him a comprehensive assault on the Great Society, which, I believe, did much to invigorate American society; abroad, it pointed to a renewal of United States purpose after our post-Vietnam paralysis. Most important, Ronald Reagan in that time at the very least forced the nation to consider our purpose and what contribution we could make; at the best, he joined us in a common vision.

Much of the disillusionment and impatience many of us now have with the so-called New Patriotism owes to its shallowness, its basic divorce from a sense of national commitment. This spirit, of which Reagan is such a principal author, might find welcome an age plagued by self-doubt; with a confident one, it is dangerously irrelevant. It has asked nothing from those more fortunate. Contrast it to John Kennedy's appeal to the nation for its idealism and intelligence for government, compare it to many European nations that compel a period of national service from its youth as a requirement of citizenship.

The New Patriotism has done none of this. It has raised a dangerously false impression: that love of country need not entail sacrifice or hardship, that Americans can pursue a self-absorbed life with no obligation to aid their fellows and, most especially, those less fortunate. It espouses the glib and the easy. It shrinks from those moral challenges that, taken together, can exalt the nation that meets them.

These dangers are sure to come; in many cases they are already here. As a people we need to decide for ourselves what we plan to do about the ongoing tragedy that occurs in our cities, with opportunities lost and babies born into a culture of poverty and despair, what we plan to do about the expectations of excellence we should raise as a goal for our schools, what we plan to do in breaking the misery that capitalism, however dynamic, so randomly visits. In all of these, the Federal Government can be a vehicle for positive action. Cost cannot be the sole factor; the lesson of Watts lies in the awful reckoning that indifference can bring.

Also frustrating with Reagan is his acquiescence of the initiative on the world stage. At this time we are facing on one hand the outright failure of totalitarians, be it in Vietnam, Afghanistan or Cuba, to give fulfillment to the aspirations of their people. On the other hand, we witness from Korea to the Phillipines to South America the first steps of peoples, often amid civil war and oppression, toward genuine democracy. The Corazon Aquinos of this world are the great leaders of our time; why have we not done more to help them?

These are not unrealistic goals. We should be sure that surpassing these problems is not outside our grasp; we are the inheritors of the newest idea, that a constitutional democracy can work for a people. To be true to our duties will, however, require the casting of notions of painless dedication and empty commitment. As we begin a third century, they simply are not good enough.

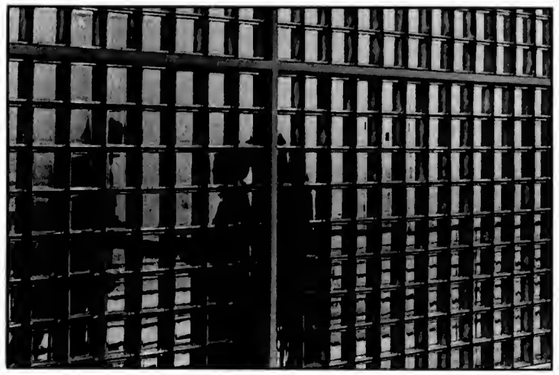
Jacobsohn on 'We the People' as it marks its 200th birthday

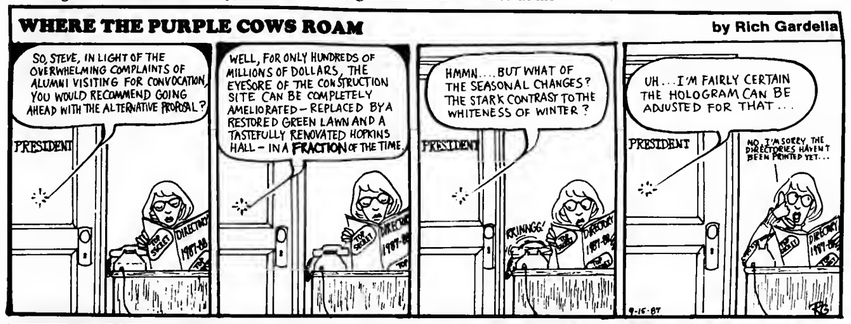
With the 200th anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution Thursday, we thought it appropriate to ask Professor of Political Science Gary Jacobsohn, a noted scholar on the Constitution here at Williams, some questions on the Constitution's past importance and continuing relevance in American life. Here are his views on a range of subjects:

On the framers of the Constitution in 1787: They were certainly a collection of unusually distinguished men. There were some rogues among them, but in general the authors had an amazing depth of historical understanding and foresight. The record before them for democracy had not been a promising one .... Their accompliishment was that the institutions they created for republican self—government were intended to survive a generation of wise men; that is, the enduring structure of government, with its cross-currents of checks and balances, might prevent great men from doing good things but also would prevent evil men from doing bad things .... If you look at the remarkable success of self-government in American society, you can attribute it largely to the ability of the Constitution to accommodate the radical changes that have occurred during the course of the last two centuries.

On the faith of the framers in the future of republican democracy: It obviously was considerable in that the government of their creation rested upon a responsible citizenry. It was, however, a cautious optimism .... Madison's writings in The Federalist Papers refer many times to the dangers of unrestrained majoritarianism. This fear was widely shared at the time.



On the Constitution and the American identity: The Constitution essentially ratified the commitment to equality and freedom made in the Declaration of Independence. It is important to view the two documents as consistent .... The Declaration contains the political expression of American democracy, the Constitution intends to create the institutions that would make that set of convictions work and give them fulfillment. Unlike other societies whose national identity is largely a function of such organic factors as language, religion, or ethnicity, the American national identity is fundamentally a product of certain political ideas — specifically, those embodied in our two most important founding documents. Therefore, a repudiation of the Constitution represents in some important way an assault on the American identity.



On Thurgood Marshall's critique of the Constitution as a document 'flawed from the outset': Certainly he is correct that it was a flawed document. The question is whether those flaws, particularly as they refer to slavery, reflect the evil purposes of a majority of the framers or whether they represent the necessary compromises that insured the adoption of the Constitution. I happen to believe, following Lincoln and Frederick Douglass, that the acknowledgement of evil in the original document did not connote its acceptance. The Constitution, taken as a whole, embodies ideals which, even though unable to be realized at the inception of the Republic, ultimately became the basis for placing the pernicious institution of slavery upon the course of ultimate extinction.

On President Reagan's nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court: I find the debate frequently suffused with hypocrisy on both sides .... On the one hand, critics of Robert Bork who are now attacking what they fear as an activism ideologically opposed to their own must, to do that, repudiate some of their greatest judicial heroes, such as Justices Black and Holmes. They represented, respectively, the twin pillars of Judge Bork's constitutional theory, namely, an insistence upon the importance of original intent and a radical moral neutrality in judging. On the other hand, conservatives who welcome what they perceive as Bork's disagreement with some landmark decisions of the past two decades have to question their commitment to one of the basic elements of conservative jurisprudence, the adherence to precedent. It is certainly legitimate to raise questions as to whether Bork's constitutional theory falls within the parameters of accepted jurisprudential approaches; for this I eagerly await the upcoming confirmation process.

On the future of the Constitution in American society: I am confident of its future, but only if we understand that future to be directly related to the qualities of the American people. The document is a necessary but not sufficient condition of the success of our continuing experiment in republican self-government. I think a wise judge, Learned Hand, got it right when he said, "A society so riven that the spirit of moderation is gone, no Court can save; a society where that spirit flourishes, no Court need save; a society which evades its responsibility by thrusting upon the Courts the nurture of that spirit, that spirit in the end will perish."

Former Williams President John Chandler moderates a panel discussion on athletics and academics last Friday night. (Albright)

Award recipients talk academics and athletics

by Peter Balaban

At a panel discussion Friday on "Athletics and the Academy," participants enumerated the benefits and joys of athletics, bemoaned the level of professionalism and corruption in "big-time college athletics," and expressed relief that Williams sports are not plagued by such problems.

The seven-member panel, which boasted three former Olympic athletes, answered a variety of questions about athletics that had been previously submitted by members of the Williams community.

Members agreed that the benefits of participation in college sports outweigh the negative aspects of collegiate athleticss.

The panelists included A. Bartlett Giamatti, the president of baseball's National League and former president of Yale University; Dr. Tenley Albright, a general surgeon and the first American woman to win, in 1956, the Olympic gold medal in figure skating; Sir Roger Bannister, a neurologist who, in 1954, became the first person to run a mile in under four minutes; and Joan Benoit Samuelson, winner, in 1984, of the first Olympic marathon for women.

College sheds some light on campus safety

by Alexandra Glover

The college is currently setting up an inspection system to maintain the campus outdoor lights in a first step towards improving the safety of students on campus, according to Dean of the College Stephen Fix. Some lighting had been intended to be installed already.

"We had hoped that certain areas would be relighted by now," Assistant Dean William Wagner said. "I think the hope was that we would be further along than we are now." Wagner attributed the delay to the great complexity and expense of wiring in new lighting.

Fix said that other factors bear on planning the location of new lights. "Traffic patterns, parking patterns, and other decisions like that affect lighting, so it is a campus planning issue of which lighting is a part," he said. Fix also noted that many burnt-out bulbs were replaced over the summer.

The installation of the lights is an initial response to a survey of campus security conducted by a sub-committee of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) last March at Fix's request. The subcommittee included the six CUL members, Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta, Director of Housing Robert Fowler, and a representative from Williams Security.

The study was initiated in the wake of several reported incidents of sexual harrassment and theft on campus. These incidents occured primarily last January, according to Wagner, chair of CUL last year.

"It would be wrong to say that the study was caused by the rape incident," said Wagner, "but...(the incident) brought things to a head."

Tracey Blankenship, the College Council representative to CUL for 1986-1987 said, "There was a louder and louder expression of concern from students, and especially from female students. The CUL felt that the students' feeling of vulnerability should be considered as much as their actual vulnerability."

The survey found that "after extensively reviewing campus security needs, the subcommittee concluded that both students and faculty remain extremely vulnerable to the threat of physical harm and students' property vulnerable to theft."

The CUL proposals included:

- Hiring lighting specialists to re-light the campus
- Illuminating frequently used light switches used after dark
- Installing on-campus telephones "in prominent places in every building used at night", and emergency telephones with a direct line to Security in troublesome areas
- Improving the existing Security escort service

The subcommittee also explored and recommended the installation of a locked door system at the college. Under this time-activated system buildings would be locked at night. A student ID card would allow students access to all dormitories, and the locking system for the other buildings could be individually programmed to accept certain cards. The flexibility of this system would allow the locks to be reprogrammed for special events such as parents' weekend.

"The upshot of the study," Wagner said, "was that ultimately everybody agreed, though there was some dissatisfaction from students who were skeptical but willing to consider (the time-locking system).

"My sense," continued Wagner, "is that we're like a situation in which any thing could happen - there's no defense ... This system would enable us to at least put up some kind of defense against that stranger coming through."

Currently the college is gathering and reviewing cost estimates of possible time-locking systems, according to Fix, who also indicated that this process of estimates should be completed in mid-fall of this school year.

The information for the study was gathered from security-related statistical data, and from student input at two open campus meetings last spring. Additional information was

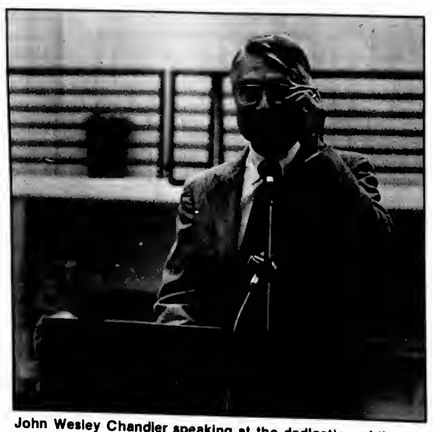
Chandler, in Washington, defends liberal arts

by John McDermott

John Chandler was invited to meet Pope John Paul II last weekend, but he chose to visit Williams instead.

Chandler, who resigned as college president in 1985, returned for Convocation weekend to dedicate the John Wesley Chandler Athletic Center and to moderate a panel on athletics and academics.



He currently heads the American Association of Colleges (AAC), a Washington-based research organization dedicated to the defense of liberal arts education. He said the AAC has about 600 member institutions and a staff of 30.

Changed curriculums

Increased awareness of the decline in liberal arts learning during the 1970's is now having an impact on education, he said in an interview Saturday. "The vast majority of colleges and universities have revised their curriculums in the last three years" toward the arts and sciences.

Chandler said enrollment in liberal arts programs has increased somewhat recently, but this follows a longer period of decline. "In 1970, about two-thirds of undergraduates were in arts and science majors," he said. "Today, those majors make up only one-third."

More than 25 percent of undergraduates pursue business degrees, he said. Chandler said that corporate leaders have increasing respect for liberal arts degrees, but added that the top executives' spirit often doesn't affect personnel officers, who must fill positions quickly.

John Wesley Chandler speaking at the dedication of the new athletic center which bears his name. (Ward)

The AAC is currently preparing a report on the state of the undergraduate major.

Recalling accomplishments

He said one of the most significant accomplishments of his administration was improving curricula and facilities for the arts. Bernhard Music Center was built during his presidency, and the first addition to the Williams College Museum of Art was constructed.

Chandler also said the residential system of the college improved during his term, in part to better meet the needs of women. The college admitted its first women students in 1969, but it was Chandler who finally removed a quota on the number of women who could attend.

One of the major student concerns of Chandler's administration was the college's investments in companies operating in South Africa. Chandler said he has not modified his opposition to divestment by colleges and universities. He said that on campuses where divestment has occured, student interest in what is going on in South Africa has waned. "On the campuses that have taken a divestment policy, the debate has disappeared," he said.

Williams crosses its fingers as it nears reaccreditation

by Craig Gangi

Williams students will have the opportunity to comment on and criticize any aspects of the college at an open meeting between students and the reaccreditation commission. Members of the administration will not be present.

The meeting will be part of the commission's four day visit beginning October 4, on behalf of the New England Association of Schools and Colleges (NEASC) to examine Williams before it is reaccredited.

In preparation for the arrival of the commission the College recently completed a self-study which will aid the commission in its evaluation of the school.

The self-study, a 251-page report to be released this week, addresses 12 standards for accreditation as well as four focus areas which the administration feels are worthy of examining. The standards are established by the NEASC.

The focus areas are academic advising, admissions and financial aid, academic regulations and procedures, and the curriculum. Faculty-student committees addressed the first three of these areas last Spring and issued reports on their findings.

The curriculum focus area was addressed by the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), which last Spring completed a two-year review of the curriculum.

Although the committees completed most of their work by May, the committee chairs continued to write and edit the final reports during the summer.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix, who sat on all of the self-study committees, said that each committee offered recommendations that will be addressed by standing committees of the College.

The report, which required the work of approximately 70 people, was sent to each of the reaccreditation commission members for review prior to their campus visit, Fix said.

The commission will be chaired by Aaron Lemonick, Dean of the Faculty of Princeton University. The other members of the group will be Barbara Bryan, a librarian at Fairfield University; Francis J. DeToma, a professor at Mount Holyoke College; Katherine P. Hall, the Registrar at Brown University; Frank Laycock, a professor at Oberlin College; Natalie J. Marshall, Vice President for Administrative and Student Services at Vassar College; and Robert G. O'Meally, an associate professor at Wesleyan University.

He added, "The spirit of reaccreditation is very much one to help schools," and said that the school does not take an adversarial position against the commission.

While on campus, the commission will also meet with the four self-study committees, or the committees' chairs, to further discuss each committee's findings.

"Reaccreditation is an assurance to the public of the College

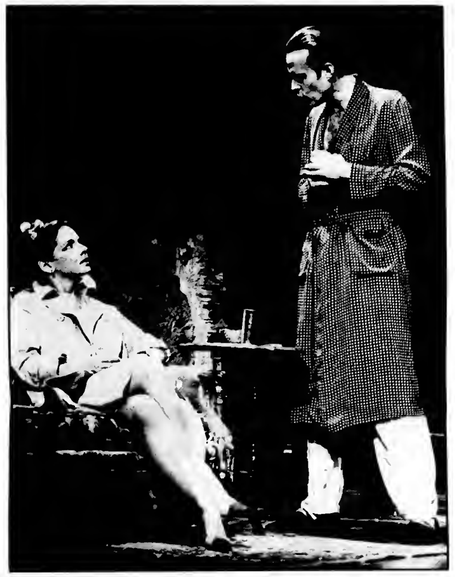
Big names spend summer way, way Off Broadway

by Anne O'Malley



If you were in Williamstown this summer, you might have run into Rob Lowe, James Belushi, Joan Van Ark or Amy Irving. They are just a few of the performers who appeared in Williamstown Theatre Festival productions such as Arthur Miller's "The Crucible" and Harold Pinter's "The Homecoming."

WTF has been bringing celebrities to Billsville every summer since 1955. "I love seeing them come in, they're often very sociable people, and I love seeing them come back at the beginning of the summer," said Ernest Blondin, night supervisor at the snack bar.

Many performers — including Frank Langella and Blythe Danner — have left their mark in the form of namesake sandwiches at Papa Charlie's Deli. Owner John Maltezos said that the sandwiches are actually created based on the celebrities' preferences. For example, Mary Tyler Moore told him that she liked bacon, lettuce, tomato and avacado.

Stephen Collins, Christopher Reeve, Harry Groener and Edward Herrmann in the Williamstown Theatre Festival production of "The River."

Stockard Channing and Dwight Scultz in "The Homecoming." Channing appeared in the films "Heartburn" and "Grease"; Schultz plays Murdock on NBC's "A-Team."

Julie Hagerty (of "Airplane" fame) and James Belushi (of "Saturday Night Live") in rehearsal for "Moon over Miami," a new play by John Guare.

WTF events include productions on both stages of the Adams Memorial Theatre, a Saturday Reading Series and Cabaret performances at area restaurants such as the Orchards and the 1896 House. In August, WTF launched The Free Theatre, a new outdoor program sponsored in part by the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities. "A Study in Scarlet," Sherlock Holmes' first adventure, was performed free of charge on the lower field of the Buxton School for audiences seated on beach blankets.

The theatre festival also runs The Workshop, an intensive 11-week program of classes and production work. Jill Clayburgh and Christopher Reeve are two of the program's 2,700 graduates; another is Mika Brzezinski'89, one of the 80 apprentices in the 1987 program.

Brzezinski said she took classes and worked in the theatre on alternating days. "We did everything from manual labor to maybe getting a part in an equity show," she said. "It was really hard work — up to 16 hours a day. It really makes you decide if you want to go into the theatre or not, and it makes you respect everyone who is involved in all aspects of the theatre."

Despite the long hours, Brzezinski said that The Workshop can be a valuable opportunity for aspiring performers. "One of the main reasons why people come as an apprentice is for the chance to get their face and their talent seen by people that make a difference in the business," she explained.

Trio shows command over classics

by Keith McIver

The Williams College Department of Music opened its 1987-88 concert season Thursday evening with an enthusiastic and well-attended performance by the Williams Trio in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Consisting of violinist Timothy Baker, Professor of Music Douglas Moore on cello, and Artist-in-Residence Doris Stevenson on piano, the Trio programmed a moderately conservative but energetic repertoire for its audience.

The concert's first piece was an effective opening: Beethoven's Trio in D, the "Ghost." In the first measures, the ensemble burst into a fast-moving staccato motive played in unison which was followed by a complete change to a placid, waltz-like legato texture. A masterful control of dynamics and excellent phrasing smoothed the transition and allowed the audience to be taken in not only by the quality of the music but also by the professional level of the Trio's ensemble playing.

The Williams Trio in concert Thursday night in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. (LeBauer)

It is the second movement that gives the piece its subtitle the "Ghost." A haunting keyboard backdrop to subdued and very slow string playing made for a musically-moving experience — goosebumps and all. Moore's singing cello was clearly at its best in this movement and complemented Baker's fine violin phrasing. There were occasions, however, when Stevenson was not on cue. The delicacy of the piece, which the subtitle suggests, requires the piano to act as an invisible yet substantial entity. But in certain tremelo passages at the pianissimo dynamic level, some notes were totally inaudible, especially in the grumbling low register of the left hand.

The second piece performed was Claude Debussy's Sonata for Violin and Piano in G. Baker, the newest member of the 17 year-old Trio, demonstrated a masterful control of bowing technique and phrasing. The modal Sonata demands of its performers strict attention to intonation and sharp coordi-

Freshmen find fun in frenzied first-year fall

by Beth Broadrup

Along with the inevitable arrival of fall in the Berkshires comes the equally inevitable arrival of station wagons packed to the brim, carrying plastic crates, suitcases, posters, and, in many cases, a freshman. Thus begins the rite of passage known as freshman year.

Williams aims to ease freshmen into real college life, with its cold-water washers and dazzling array of mushroom dishes, during Freshman Days. Williams' newest group of frosh, the Class of 1991 (the only current class whose year is the same spelled backwards or forwards, a true distinction) carried on the tradition September 6-8.

Friendship

Freshman Days events included the annual first night picnic-with-the-entry-and-everyone-else-you-don't-know, a lecture on friendship by philosophy professor Rosemarie Tong, placement tests, Professor Whitney Stoddard's lecture on the tree-ridden Williams campus, a dance at Baxter with music by The Bust, the Purple Key fair, Casino Night, and brunch at the Oakley's.

Freshmen attitudes about Freshman Days have not changed much in recent years. Tracy Davis '91 reported "sitting around in the grass because there were no seats," possibly the result of upperclassmen taking a free meal anywhere they could find it. Of Whitney Stoddard's energetic lecture "A Sense of Where You Are," Anna Butters '91 commented, "It was interesting that he wanted to bring sheep back on campus."

Tong's lecture generated conversation in entries across campus. "Our entry is from a lot of different backgrounds, but we have a lot of the same ideas about friendship," Butters commented. Freshmen were not quite as enthusiastic about the placement tests they had to take; Butters called them the "worst part of Freshman Days."

In accordance with Williams tradition, the dance at Baxter was hot, noisy and packed, as was Casino Night. Many freshmen headed down the hill for a taste of party Mission-style after the dance at Baxter. Obviously a group eager to learn.

Cucumber sandwiches

Freshmen had their first official brush with greatness on the lawn of the President's House. Besides shaking the hand of President Oakley, what might the highlight of the affair have been? "Mrs. Oakley made us cucumber sandwiches with mayonnaise," according to Butters.

So much behind them already, but so much ahead. We won't worry them about inclusion just yet.

nation and demands of its audience a relaxed state of mind that is necessary to enjoy and appreciate its delicate nuances. The animated Finale was especially pleasing. The audience seemed captivated by the commanding voice of Baker's violin that sounded both heavy and mystical.

The evening's final piece was Brahms' Trio in C. The group was so comfortable in its majestic performance of the piece that it seemed as if it had been composed specifically for the Trio. The members of the Trio were all sensitive to the work's blending of musical colors. The Theme and Variations allowed for a powerful Brahms to surface while the Scherzo lived up to its name and character thanks to the cohesive ensemble playing of the Trio.

Arts in view . . .

Thursday at 8 p.m. the Department of Music presents Carl Jenkins, oboe, and Jane Jenkins, piano, in recital in Brooks-Rogers Hall. The program will feature Mozart's Quintet for Piano and Winds and admission is free.....Also on Thurday at 8 p.m., Jean Sutherland Boggs, director emeritus of the National Gallery of Canada, will give a lecture entitled "Degas: The Dancer and the Fan." It will take place in the Clark Art Institute auditorium.....On Friday at 5 p.m., also in the Clark Auditorium, Bob Seigetsu will perform "Music of Wind and Water" on the shakahachi, a Japanese bamboo flute. An opening reception for the exhibition "Hiroshige: The 53 Stages of the Tokaida" will follow.....There will be Japanese craft demonstrations along with Japanese music, theater, film, and food, all from 12:30 to 4 p.m. Saturday in the Berkshire Quad next to the College's Art Museum. The festivities are in conjunction withthe museum's current exhibition "Mingei: Japanese Folk Art." For information on events sponsored by the Department of Music, call Concertline at 597-3146.

One of the inventions for which cartoonist Rube Goldberg is famous, now on display at the Williams College Museum of Art.

Rube Goldberg on display at WCMA

by Michael Erard

An exhibition of Rube Goldberg's work opened at the Williams College Museum of Art on Saturday. Included in the exhibition are original drawings, sketches, cartoons and a sculpture. The exhibit was donated to the museum by Goldberg's son, George W. George, a 1941 Williams graduate.

Rube Goldberg (1883-1970) graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with an engineering degree because, according to George, his father told him that "artists can't make a living." He began drawing for the San Francisco Chronicle and the New York Evening Mail and eventually became the highest-paid cartoonist in America.

His early work in daily and weekly comic strips and later work with political cartoons provided an outlet for his keen moral sense and satirical approach to technology and social interaction.

Goldberg is perhaps most famous for his fantastic inventions, a number of which are included in the exhibit. A "Rube Goldberg" invention is currently defined by Webster's Dictionary as "a contrivance that brings about by complicated means what apparently could be accomplished simply."

"He shows machines as he really thought they were used for," said Thomas Feis, one of the organizers of the exhibit: "to mess life up."

During the late 1950s Goldberg tried to produce television shows featuring some of these inventions. Only three or four episodes of 50 or 60 that were planned for were actually filmed and televised. Some of the sketches for the episodes are included in the exhibit as rare pieces of Goldberg's work because, according to his son, Goldberg didn't normally save that kind of work.

The sculpture in the exhibit, one of the 300 which Goldberg completed, is a small-scale model of a fountain. According to George's wife, Judy, Goldberg became interested in creating the fountain because he thought New York City had such poor ones. She quoted him as having said, "New York gives such bad fountains. They just spit."

The exhibit will run through October 25.

Two great ways to cruise through the semester.

The hand on the left is poised on what could be the most essential part of your education.
A Macintosh™ computer.
And the hand on the right is gripping pure, simple, unadulterated fun.
A Honda Scooter. One we're giving away.
All you have to do for a chance to drive it away is visit your campus computer center and fill out an entry form. While you're there, take a Macintosh for a test drive.
Because Macintosh can help you write term papers, categorize elements of the periodic table, plot the rise and fall of pork-belly prices, compile computer code, and talk to other computers.
And the first 250 people on campus who get behind a mouse, so to speak, will receive a free Apple® memo board.
So head over to your campus computer center today. And ask about our Student Financing Program.
Who knows? You may soon find yourself cruising a little farther than you expected.

Jack Chessman, Spring St. fixture, dies

John Joseph Chessman, 90, who worked as a watchman for Williams College from 1929 to 1963, died last Monday at North Adams Regional Hospital, where he had been admitted June 20.

Chessman, of 107 Latham St., was known in recent years as a fixture of Spring Street — distinguished by his friendly greeting, his gradual gait, and a hat adorned with various medals.

He was also a familiar figure on the college's campus, especially in the Snack Bar. His nickname was "Jack," but some students referred to him, affectionately, as "the mayor of Spring Street."

Chessman was a ticket collector at Williams basketball games through last season, when he was honored at one game for his dedication to the college's sports teams.

From 1964 to 1985, he worked as a ticket-taker at the Green Mountain Race Track in Pownal, Vermont.

Chessman was born in East Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1896. He joined the U.S. Army during the First World War, serving in France with the American Expeditionary Force. Between 1919 and 1921, he served with the U.S. Navy.

He came to Williamstown in 1924, working as a bell captain at the old Greylock Hotel before he joined the staff of the college.

Chessman's wife, Catherine, died in 1978.

A funeral mass was celebrated Thursday at St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church. Chessman was buried in Eastlawn Cemetery.

Oakley briefs faculty on race relations panel

by Allison Wertheim

College President Francis Oakley expressed enthusiasm about the new Commission on Campus Race Relations last Wednesday at the first faculty meeting of the academic year.

The Commission is comprised of two students, two faculty members, and two members of the administrative staff. Political Science Professor Timothy Cook will serve as chairman.

Oakley announced the establishment of the Commission last spring following a demand by the Williams Black Student Union for the formation of a grievance committee.

Oakley said at the meeting that the Commission was developed in response to the growing racial pluralism of the College campus. "I do not regard this as an ad hoc response, but a continuing entity addressing a set of problems which are unlikely to yield quickly or readily to solution," he stressed.

He said he was confident that all members of the faculty would be eager to assist the Commission in its endeavors.

In other business, the faculty unanimously approved a motion to appoint Registrar Charles Toomajian as an ex-officio member of the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP). Toomajian's input would be beneficial because many of the issues discussed by the CEP have structural implications and impediments, Associate professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong said. In the past the registrar has attended CEP meetings as a non-voting guest.

Oakley also updated the faculty on the college's involvement in the proposed renovation of the Sprague Electric Co. plant in North Adams for use as a museum of contemporary art. He said Williams will provide only governance services, and that conditions of the plan preclude any commitment of college funds.

He said his vision of this project is sparked by what he sees as the significance in our culture of contemporary artistic achievments.

as a legitimate and truthful institution," Fix said.

The commission is scheduled to submit its evaluation report to NEASC in December.

The school's last reaccreditation, in 1977, involved much less need for statistical and financial information, according to Fix.

At that time, the school was not required to comment on the 12 standards for accreditation in its self-study report.

ably include city and state leaders and Williams College officials.

Krens added that he expected an announcement soon by Sprague Technologies, Inc., that it would donate the 28-building complex for the museum.

Krens said that noted architects Robert Venturi and Stanley Tigerman had toured the site over the summer, lending their ideas on its renovation. Art collector Panza also visited, he said.

In one of the details which has attracted media attention to the Mass. MoCA proposal, Krens said he had discussed with artist Richard Serra the relocation to North Adams of his minimalist sculpture, "Tilted Arc," which now sits in a federal building plaza in Manhattan. Many New Yorkers have found the wall-like sculpture objectionable, the New York Times reported.

gathered during a nighttime campus tour conducted by several members of the subcommittee. A successive tour included a landscape architect to examine the practical problems of additional lighting.

Many areas were designated as "urgently need (ing) lighting or improved lighting." The area surrounding Mission Park, the Towne Field House parking lot, the Berkshire Quadrangle, Greylock Quadrangle and parking lot, the art studios and Grace Court were all included on this list, as well as others. "The area around Mission Park is in desperate need," said Wagner.

Blankenship and Wagner noted that one immediate measure which students can take is to lock their own doors, a move which has been strongly recommended by Security.

"While there is not a large number of incidents," said Wagner, "with certain types of incidents one is too many, as in any incident where there is physical harm to a student."

IBM ANNOUNCES
August 4, 1987
IBM Information Systems Group
Personal System/2
Model 25, large storage Mod 80 debut for students and business

IBM today broadened the scope of its widely accepted Personal System/2® family of products. At the low end, the model for business and educational computing is now more affordable. At the high end, the most powerful model in the family is also available. The new Model 25 offers customers greatly expanded storage capacity and performance.

The new IBM Personal System/2 Model 25, the lowest priced family member, is 60 percent smaller than and more than twice as fast as the IBM Personal Computer. It is designed to be set up easily and used quickly by students, teachers, school administrators working in their offices and at home. The Model 25 also is available in a Collegiate version for higher education.

The new version of the Model 80 provides 314 megabytes (MB) fixed disk storage, expandable up to a maximum of 628MB with the optional 314MB Fixed Disk Drive Option. The Model 80 is ideal for businesses where concurrent data sharing among multiple users, and where resource-sharing applications require even more Fixed disk storage than is available in other IBM Personal Computers. The Model 80 is now more than twice as fast as the Model 70 and has a 3.5-inch, 1.4 megabyte (MB) diskette drive. The Model 80 also has a 3.5-inch, 2.88 MB diskette drive; 5.25-inch, 1.2 MB diskette drive; a 3.5-inch, 720 kilobyte (KB) diskette drive; 5.25-inch, 360 KB diskette drive; and a 3.5-inch, 1.4 megabyte (MB) diskette drive. The Model 80 also has a 32-bit microchannel architecture, a 3.5-inch, 314MB fixed disk drive, system board memory expandable to 16 MB, and a 16/32-bit microprocessor.

The price of the Model 80 is $13,995. The Model 80 is also available in a Collegiate version for higher education. The new version of the IBM Personal System/2 Model 80 offers businesses and technical professionals more than two times the speed of the standard Model 80 at about half the price.

The Personal System/2 Model 25 Collegiate combines the 25 standard Model 25, a second diskette drive, 128K B additional memory and the unique IBM Personal System/2 Collegiate Kit in a specially designed application package for higher education. Included in the Collegiate Kit are Microsoft® Windows™ 1.04, the Microsoft Windows System/2 Mouse, IBM DOS 3.3 for the first time, and the tools that enable students and teachers to edit and create and print compositte documents containing multi-font text and graphics. Available immediately are the Collegiate Kit, $214; the optional diskette drive, $170; and the 128KB Memory Expansion Kit, $49. □

New Model 80 features up to 628MB storage

• Collegiate model offers higher education tools

It can serve as either a powerful stand-alone or network-connected system. Most software applications that run on the IBM Personal System/2 Model 30, with two diskette drives, will run on a similarly configured Model 25. The Model 25 shares with other Personal System/2 models similar architecture, display and graphics. It uses the same 3.5-inch diskette and IBM Disk Operating System (DOS) 3.3 as the more powerful Model 30. Other advanced features such as a Graphics Array capabilities, an audio earphone connector and serial, parallel, pointing device and keyboard ports. □ and group executive for the company's Information Systems Group. "They will provide our customers a greater choice of speed, memory, storage and connectivity options to meet their current and future computing needs. The Model 25 is ideal for a wide variety of tasks. It can be used by kindergarten students learning to read with IBM's popular Writing to Read program, by entry students to within secretarial areas, and by executives to create graphics presentations."

Panel

Robert Peck, director of the department of physical education, and George Goethals, professor of psychology and acting dean of the faculty, also participated.

The discussion was chaired by John Chandler, the previous president of Williams, for whom the new John Wesley Chandler Athletic Center is named. Chandler is currently president of the Association of American Colleges.

Chandler opened the discussion by evoking the words of Mark Hopkins, the College's first president, who wrote that Williams students "eat too much and sit up too late under the excitement of novel reading."

As a remedy, Hopkins suggested excercise. "Let them saw their own wood," he wrote.

Several of the panelists discussed the benefits of athletics from the viewpoint of personal experience.

Albright said that medicine and athletics are similar because in training for figure skating and preparing for surgery "only you know if you've done everything you possibly can to effect the outcome you want."

Samuelson said that athletics taught her how to prioritize and set goals, and that she learned through athletics that you can not achieve your goals if you take short cuts.

"Even on my training loops I never cut the corners. I always ran around the edge of the barn," she added.

Samuelson said that when she was busy with athletics she found that she did better academically, and that when she was injured she tended to procrastinate and lose focus in the classroom.

Participants also answered a group of questions on athletics and the life of the mind within the academy.

"What this institution (Williams) is about is the development of excellence in all areas, primarily in the intellectual area," Goethals said.

"Athletics can make a strong contribution to the development of self," he added. "It is important for Williams to recognize the value of athletics in terms of the personal development that it promotes in participants."

Giamatti said he detected an underlying assumption in some of the questions submitted to the panel that academic values and athletic values are in conflict, which he said is not the case.

"Play is a fundamental human need," added Bannister, "and there is no need for us to be justifying (athletics) in terms of some deeper social, academic, or intellectual good."

Peck told the assembled crowd, which filled most of Chapin Hall, that athletes should ask themselves, "What do I get out of participating? Why do I do it? Is it satisfying?"

In response to a number of questions on corruption and professionalism in athletic programs at many large universities, Giamatti acknowledged that there is "an extraordinary amount of corruption in most big-time athletic programs. In effect, schools pay athletes to participate in revenue-raising activities."

Giamatti said that making employees of college athletes "gives up on the problem and says in effect that it's all right to make some people commercialized. It recognizes," he added, "the hypocrisy of a number of programs and then acquiesces."

He said that reform must come from within, and that the academic community must pull itself together and regain control of intercollegiate athletics. If it doesn't, the federal government may move in, he said.

Samuelson said that when she coached at Boston University she became disenchanted because athletics for many students was their only ticket to a college education.

"They would give what was expected of them, and not a heck of a lot more," she said.

Goethals said he thought that what is going on at Williams "is fundamentally sound and should be quite separate from this other world."

Peck pointed out that it is dangerous for Division III schools like Williams to take on a "holier than thou" attitude toward Division I schools. "We should recognize that we too have a stake in what happens in big-time college athletics. It effects the image of sports everywhere."

"Our intercollegiate program has some media value even in the Berkshires," Peck added, "and we will continue to train intercollegiate teams. The new gym will allow us to do a little bit better job for everyone."

He said the new facility will provide additional recreational facilities for the general student body and the community, as well as better practice facilities for the teams."

Peck said that recruiting procedures will not change because of the new facility, although it may be easier to recruit athletes than before.

Peck also answered questions on whether programs and facilities at Williams provide equitable treatment for women athletes.

"Things really have changed. When I came to Williams in 1971, Lasell was a male bastion. Women didn't feel comfortable there.... That's not what I saw this afternoon in Lasell. There were 10 women playing basketball on the court, getting an early jump on the season."

Peck said that spectators attitudes toward women's sports have changed and that fans today have more respect for talented female athletes.

"That doesn't mean our attitudes are perfect at Williams, but they have come a long way," he added.

open and available to the whole country."

Finally, Giamatti spoke on the similarities between his experiences as Yale President and National League President. "I think being President of Yale prepared me to deal with the prima donnas. And dealing with many other things including multiple constituencies, but most importantly, to deal with having more responsibility than authority."

Despite being chosen as National League President, A. Bartlett Giamatti remains first and foremost a baseball fan. Ironically he once said in his youth that he had no desire to ever be anything other than President of the American League. He admitted his passion for the Boston Red Sox, and affirmed his love for the sport by saying: "A baseball game has so much going on in it. I never find them slow, because there is so much strategy and so many things to talk about ... Its the greatest game in the world."

Farley

student can have result from "dealing with the failure, adversity, and success that one encounters in football. Sometimes finding oneself is more important than what a lab book says."

He also likened the camraderie, friendships and locker room associations one makes through the sport to those same "associations later in life, such as a bunch of doctors in a hospital conference room, or a group of lawyers in a smoke room." It is in this way, he said, that football "is emotional preparation for life."

It is clear that Farley cares about his athletes. His concern is evidenced by his view of the sport as an educational tool. He views football as "a complicated game; one that challenges bright and intelligent kids. I get tickled when they say that a scheme or play is tougher to learn than their class work. It shows I'm making them think. Football is just like any other program within the school such as the music or art department. We've always gotten great support, and I hope we will continue to. That is why I always encourage the kids to go to lectures, concerts, etc. It is better for them in the long run. I don't want them to be one-dimensional people."

Soon it will be apparent if Farley can help this football team forge a winning season where others have recently failed. The coach described himself as "excited, enthusiastic, and yet scared to death. My enthusiasm doesn't necessarily carry over into wins. I'm prepared. But if we don't win, the albatross is on my neck. But if we lose, we're not losers, as long as you can look in the mirror when its all said and done."

A. Bartlett Giamatti: a baseball purist

by Al Mottur
and Marc McDermott

After his speech entitled "The State of the College Game" A. Bartlett Giamatti gave a 2:00 p.m. press conference in the Stetson Faculty Lounge. At the interview, Giamatti spoke on a subject even closer to his heart: baseball. One underlying theme ran through the interview — Giamatti's traditional purist view of the game.

Declaring the World Series to be the "crown jewel of sports," he decried anything that would detract from the uniqueness of it. This would include regular season interleague play as well as playoff formats such as wild card berths "which those other distinguished leagues employ. We don't have wild cards. You don't need an Apple PC to figure out whose in (the playoffs). Baseball is straightforward. Its the greatest game in the world."

Giamatti then went so far as to attack the seven game League Championship Series. Reaffirming the need to preserve the World Series' importance, he disagreed with the two year old move to a seven game League Championship Series format because of its potential to render the World Series anticlimactic.

Staying in overdrive, he turned to one of his pet peeves, the designated hitter rule. Displaying a characteristic sardonic wit, he denounced the rule as a "bad idea whose time is past. With all due respect to the American League; its a new league, but its a distinguished league, I don't like the DH. The National League has no interest in deviating from the way the game was meant to be played."

He next shifted his distaste to the recent rash of cheating incidents. Despite player protests about the severity of penalties issued by Giamatti to Billy Hatcher of the Houston Astros and Kevin Gross of the Philadelphia Phillies, the President of the NL defended those sanctions.

He said the act of cheating is a "cool, rational, pre-meditated act and is far more onerous than an impulsive physical act of fighting." He even went so far as to suggest that managers and coaches should be held accountable for their players cheating infractions, and promised he would take an official stance as of next season. "I have been told by more managers about more players on more teams who cork bats or scuff balls. I can't believe that they're ignorant about their own teams.

Coaches cheat too

"If a pitcher scuffs a ball, I can't believe that his pitching coach doesn't know it. If he doesn't know it then he shouldn't be the coach; and if he does know it and condones it then he should be held responsible."

The interview then moved away from the action between the foul lines and to the sticky problem of affirmative action in baseball hiring. Giamatti carefully commented about former Los Angeles Dodger general manager Al Campanis for his recent remarks on ABC news' Nightline show: "Mr. Campanis is a fine man who holds certain views which I do not share. He was in a difficult situation."

Giamatti decried baseball's "racist past" and spoke of a two pronged attack with each club working on every level, especially in the front office to make the game more open and available to job opportunities.

A. Bartlett Giamatti delivers his keynote address at Convocation on Saturday morning. Later in the day, he held a press conference in which he discussed his true love, baseball. (Albright)

"I'm not only interested in the short term, but in the long term. Because its a fundamental moral conviction that if this game is going to appeal to the whole country it has to engage the whole country; it has to be

Soccer ready and kicking

Season opens tomorrow

by Ted Hobart

Tomorrow's season opener against Springfield at Cole Field marks the beginning of Coach Mike Russo's ninth season as head coach of Williams soccer. Entering with a 57-39-12 record as head coach, Russo hopes to improve on last year's 8-4-2 record and to get back into the East Coast Athletic Conference playoffs.

The key to this year's team is whether the young squad can make it through a murderous early season in good shape. Following the opener against Division II Springfield, Williams faces ECAC tournament finalist Hamilton followed by ECAC champion Middlebury. Games against North Adams and Clark, both invited to last year's Division III tourney, and Dartmouth round out the tough first six contests for the Ephs.

Lost from last season's Little Three Champion's are seven seniors, whose leadership will be sorely missed. Coach Russo noted that strong leadership among team members is a key to guiding a young team to success, and was quick to point out how pleased he is that captain Nikolai Nachamkin '88 has led this predominantly freshman and sophomore unit.

Nachamkin echoed Russo's sentiment of how important it would be for the young team to adjust to new pressures, particularly in the rough first half of the season. He was confident in the younger players' ability to handle the tough schedule, saying, "The sophomores are probably our strongest class, and the freshman come from such good high school programs that they shouldn't have much trouble adjusting to college level soccer."

tough preseason

Nachamkin added that the tough preseason scrimmages against UMass, Middlebury, Kene St. and Union had done well in preparing them for the regular season. He also stressed that getting back to the playoffs was a main goal of the team as well as the Little Three. "Last year was our poorest year since I've been here," the captain added.

Coach Russo said, "Our early competition determines our tournament toughness, because those are the teams we are going to see (in the playoffs)." He added, "Our schedule was rated the second most difficult in New England." Yet the coach remains very optimistic about the Ephs' chances this season, and he has good reason to be.

Despite losing seven seniors, including four starters, Russo returns an impressive lineup of players. 1986 All-American selection Mike Masters '89 leads the attack up front, along with sophomores Doug Brooks and Jeff Igharo and freshman Rob Lake. Captain Nachamkin leads the midfielders along with senior Kurt Schroeder, joined by sophomores Ambi Stern and Norwegian Dag Stave, whom Coach Russo describes as "a real pleasant surprise." Brian Jennings '89, Emil Mugnani '89, and Peter Lynn '91 will also see time in the midfield.

The loss of last year' co-captain and sweeper Jon Deveaux '87 is important because the sweeper is the crucial position in anchoring the defense. Dan Calichman '90 has been ably filling his shoes so far and is aided by the experience of seniors Mike Roach and Mike Morris on defense. Rob Swan '90 will also start on defense, and freshmen Steve Bailey and John Kennel have

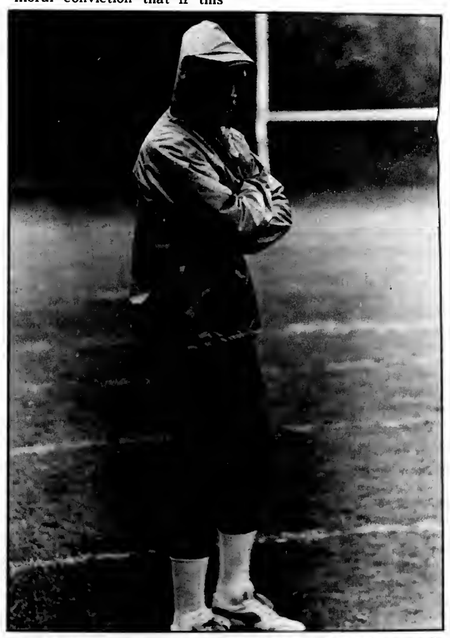
Farley "excited, enthusiastic, yet scared to death"

by Al Mottur



It has been a long wait for Richard Farley. The former Boston University athlete of the year and San Diego Charger defensive back will take Weston Field against Middlebury on September 26 as the Williams head football coach. Farley had been with the program for fifteen years as an assistant coach and was chosen to succede Bob Odell after an exhaustive national search.

As the program enters its post-Odell phase, Farley does not represent the only change in the Williams coaching staff. Five new assistant coaches will roam the sidelines this fall and with them will come new ideas, schemes, and coaching philosophies. The play-calling and the offensive and defensive schemes will be different, according to Farley, although the defense will stay much as it was last year, he said.

As Farley comes to the helm, he leaves another nearby — that of head coach of the Williams men's track team. Although he is saddened to leave the successful program behind, he will still serve as an advisor to the team in the spring. Farley claimed that the experiences gained "when coaching the ultimate individual sport will tremendously benefit me when I coach the ultimate team sport."

Coach speaks candidly

Described by some of his players as a reserved yet sometimes emotional coach, Farley spoke revealingly for almost an hour this past week about his hopes, fears, and athletic philosophies as he enters his first season at the helm. Farley candidly expressed his beliefs about the game and college athletics and said that there were never "reservations about what I was going to do in life. I've enjoyed youth and sport and felt always that you could learn a lot from (them)."

Rookie head football coach Richard Farley observes his squad's first scrimmage of the year on Saturday at Cole field against Mass Maritime. (LeBauer)

Having been a star Division I athlete and a successful NFL defensive back, one might think that Farley would find the Williams program and its athletes below his customary expectations of athletic excellence. Yet, although he admits that he once sought "to move on to a higher level," he says now that "philosophically, Williams is the best with regard to its approach to athletics. At the next level, (people) do some things that aren't so good."

'sun still shines'

Calling football an extension of the classroom the rookie head coach said that all he asks from his players is that they "give 100% of what they've got and hopefully that will help (us) be successful. If not, the sun will still shine the next day." Elaborating on the classroom aspect of the sport he said that some of the most valuable experiences a
